SANDFORD AND MERTON,

A W O R K

Intended for the Use of CHILDREN.

Let not, O generous youth! thy mind recoil
At transitory pain, or manly toil!
Nor fondly linger in the painted vale,
Nor crop the flowers, nor woo the fummer's gale!
Heedles of pleasure's voice, be thine the care
Nobly to suffer and sublimely dare!
While virtue waves on high her radiant prize,
And each hard step but lifts thee to the skies.

SANDFORD AND MERTON.

Mrs. Merton, though ignorant of the danger of her son, was not undisturbed at home. Some accounts had been brought of Harry's combat, which served to make her uneasy and to influence her still more against him. Mrs. Compton too and Miss Matilda, who had conceived a violent dislike to Harry, were busy to inflame her by their malicious representations. While she was in these dispositions Mr. Merton happened to enter, and was at once attacked by all the ladies upon the subject of this improper improper connection. He endeavoured, for a long time, to remove their prejudices by reason, but when he found that to be impossible, he contented himself with telling his wife, that a little time would perhaps decide which were the most proper com-panions for their son; and that till Harry had done something to render himself unworthy of their notice he never could confent to the treating him with coldness or neglect. At this moment a female fervant burst into the room with all the wildness of affright, and cried out with a voice that was fcarcely articulate, Oh! madam, madam! fuch an accident—poor, dear mafter Tom-my..... What of him, for God's fake? cried out Mrs. Merton, with an impatience and concern that fufficiently marked her feelings. Nay, madam, answered the servant, he is not much hurt they say: but little Sandsord has taken him to a bullbaiting, and the bull has gored him, and William and John are bringing him home in their arms. These words were scarcely delivered when Mrs. Merton uttered a violent shriek, and was instantly seized with an hysteric fit. While the ladies were all employed in affifting her and restoring her senses, Mr. Merton, who, though much alarmed.

alarmed, was more composed, walked precipitately out, to learn the truth of this imperfect narration. He had not proceeded far, before he met the crowd of children and fervants, one of whom carried Tommy Merton in his arms. As foon as he was convinced that his fon had received no other damage than a violent fright, he began to inquire into the circumstances of the affair, but before he had time to receive any information, Mrs. Merton, who had recovered from her fainting, came running wildly from the house. When she saw that her fon was fafe, she caught him in her arms, and began to utter all the incoherent expressions of a mother's fondness. It was with difficulty that her hufband could prevail upon her to moderate her transports till they were within. Then she gave a loose to her feelings in all their violence; and, for a confiderable time, was incapable of attending to any thing but the joy of his miraculous prefervation. At length, however, the became more composed, and observing that all the company were present except Harry Sandford, the exclaimed with fudden indignation; So, I fee that little abominable wretch has not had the impudence to follow you in: and I almost wish that the bull-A 3 bull had gored him as he deferved. What little wretch, mamma, faid Tommy, do you mean? Whom can I mean, cried Mrs. Merton, but that vile Harry Sandford, that your father is fo fond of, and who had nearly coft you your life by leading you into this danger? He! mamma, faid Tommy, he lead me into danger! He did all he could to persuade me not to go; and I was a very naughty boy indeed, not to take his advice. Mrs. Merton stood amazed at this information; for her prejudices had operated fo powerfully upon her mind, that she had implicitly believed the guilt of Harry upon the imperfect evidence of the maid. Who was it then, said Mr. Merton, could be so imprudent? Indeed, papa, answered Tommy, we were all to blame, all but Harry, who advifed and begged us not to go, and particularly me, because he said it would give you so much uneasiness when you knew it, and that it was so dangerous a diversion. Mrs. Merton looked confused at her mistake, but Mrs. Compton observed that she supposed Harry was assaid of the danger, and therefore had wisely kept out of the way. Oh! no, indeed, madam, answered one of the little boys; Harry is no coward, though we thought him fo at first, when he let let master Tommy strike him; but he fought Mafter Mash in the bravest manner I ever faw, and though Master Mash fought very well, yet Harry had the advantage; and I faw him follow us at a little distance, and keep his eye upon Master Merton all the time, till the bull broke loofe; and then I was fo frightened that I do not know what became of him. So, this is the little boy, faid Mr. Merton, that you were for driving from the fociety of your children! But let us hear more of the story, for as yet I know neither the particulars of his danger nor his escape. Upon this, one of the ser-vants, who from some little distance had feen the whole affair, was called in and examined. He gave them an exact account of all; of Tommy's misfortune; of Harry's bravery; of the unexpected fuccour of the poor black; and filled the whole room with admiration that fuch an action, fo noble, fo intrepid, fo fortunate, should have been atchieved by fuch a child.

Mrs. Merton was now filent with shame at reflecting upon her own unjust prejudices, and the ease with which she had become the enemy of a boy who had saved the life of her darling son; and who appeared as much superior in character to all the young gentlemen at her house, as they exceeded him in rank and fortune. The young ladies now forgot their former objections to his person and manners, and such is the effect of genuine virtue, all the company conspired to extol the conduct of Harry to the skies. But Mr. Merton, who had appeared more delighted than all the rest with the relation of Harry's intrepidity, now cast his eyes around the room, and seemed to be looking for his little friend. But when he could not find him, he faid, with some concern, Where can be our little deliverer? Sure he can have met with no accident that he has not returned with the rest! No, faid one of the fervants, as to that, Harry Sandford is fafe enough, for I faw him go towards his own home in company with the black. Alas! answered Mr. Merton, furely he must have received some unworthy treatment that could make him thus abruptly defert us all. And now I recollect that I heard one of the young gentlemen mention a blow that Harry had received; furely, Tommy, you could not have been so basely ungrateful as to strike the best and noblest of your friends! Tommy, at this, hung down his head; his face was covered with a burning blush, and the tears began filently . simps 1 h filently to trickle down his cheeks. Mrs. Merton remarked the anguish and confusion of her child, and, catching him in her arms, was going to clafp him to her bosom with the most endearing expressions; but Mr. Merton, hastily interrupting her, faid, It is not now a time to give way to fondness and a child, that, I fear, has acted the basest and vilest part that can difgrace an human being; and who, if what I suspect is true, can be only a dishonour to his parents. At this Tommy could no longer contain himself, but burst out into such a violent transport of crying, that Mrs. Merton, who feemed to feel the severity of Mr. Merton's conduct with still more poignancy than her son, caught her darling up in her arms, and carried him abruptly out of the room, ac-companied by most of the ladies, who pi-tied Tommy's abasement; and agreed that there was no crime he could have been guilty of which was not amply atoned for by ; fuch a charming fenfibility.

But Mr. Merton, who now felt all the painful interest of a tender father, and confidered this as the critical moment which was to give his son the impression of worth or baseness for life, was determined to examine the affair to the utmost. He therefore took the first opportunity of drawing the little boy aside who had mentioned master Merton's striking Harry, and questioned him upon the subject. But he, who had no particular interest in disguising the truth, related the circumstances nearly as they had happened; and, though he a little softened matters in Tommy's favour, yet, without intending it, he held up fuch a picture of his violence and injustice as wounded his father to the foul. While Mr. Merton was occupied by these uneasy feelings, he was agreeably furprized by a visit from Mr. Barlow, who came accidentally to fee him, with a perfect ignorance of all the great events which had fo recently happened. Mr. Merton received this worthy man with the fincerest cordiality; but there was fuch a gloom diffused over all his manners, that Mr. Barlow began to suspect that all was not right with Tommy, and therefore purposely inquired after him, to give his father an opportunity of speaking. This Mr. Merton did not fail to do; and taking Mr. Barlow affectionately by the hand, he faid, Oh! my dear fir, I begin to fear that all my hopes are at an end in that boy, and all your kind endeavours thrown away. He has just behaved in such a manner as shews him him to be radically corrupted, and infensible of every principle but pride. He then re-lated to Mr. Barlow every incident of Tommy's behaviour, making the severest reflections upon his infolence and ingratitude, and blaming his own supineness that had not earlier checked these boisterous passions, that now burst forth with such a degree of fury and threatened ruin to his hopes. Indeed, answered Mr. Barlow, I am very sorry to hear this account of my little friend; yet, I do not see it quite in so serious a light as yourself: and, though I cannot deny the dangers that may arise from a character so susceptible of false impressions, and so violent at the same time, yet I do not think the corruption either so great, or so general, as you feem to suspect. Do we not see, even in the most trisling habits of body or speech, that a long and continual attention is required, if we would wish to change them; and yet our perseverance is in the end generally successful? Why then should we imagine that those of the mind are less obstinate, or subject to different laws? Or, why should we rashly abandon ourselves to despair, from the first experi-ments that do not succeed according to our wishes? Indeed, answered Mr. Merton, A 6 what what you fay is perfectly confiftent with the general benevolence of your character; and most consolatory to the tenderness of a father. Yet, I know too well the general weakness of parents in respect to the faults of their children, not to be upon my guard against the delusions of my own mind. And when I consider the abrupt transition of my fon into every thing that is most inconfistent with goodness; how lightly, how instantaneously he seems to have forgotten every thing he had learned with you, I cannot help forming the most painful and melancholy prefages of the future. Alas, fir, answered Mr. Barlow, what is the general malady of human nature but this very instability which now appears in your fon? Do you imagine that half the vices of men arise from real depravity of heart? On the contrary, I am convinced that human nature is infinitely more weak than wicked; and that the greater part of all bad conduct fprings rather from want of firmness than from any fettled propenfity to evil. Indeed, replied Mr. Merton, what you fay is highly reasonable; nor did I ever expect that a boy so long indulged and spoiled should be exempt from failings. But what particularly hurts me is, to fee him proceed to fuch difdifagreeable extremities without any adequate temptation; extremities that I fear imply a defect of goodness and generosity, virtues which I always thought he had posfessed in a very great degree. Neither, an-fwered Mr. Barlow, am I at all convinced that your son is deficient in either. But you are to consider the prevalence of example, and the circle to which you have lately introduced him. If it is so difficult even for persons of a more mature age and experience to resist the impressions of those with whom they constantly affociate, how can you expect it from your fon? To be armed against the prejudices of the world, and to diftinguish real merit from the splendid vices which pass current in what is called society, is one of the most difficult of human sciences. Nor do I know a single character, however excellent, that would not candidly confess he has often made a wrong election, and paid that homage to a brilliant outfide which is only due to real merit. You comfort me very much, said Mr. Merton, but fuch ungovernable paffions! fuch violence and impetuofity!-Are indeed very formidable, replied Mr. Barlow. Yet, when they are properly directed, frequently produce the noblest effects; and history, history, as well as private observation, may inform us, that, if they sometimes lead their possession aftray, they are equally capable of bringing him back to the right path, provided they are properly acted upon. You have, I doubt not, read the story of Polemo, who, from a debauched young man, became a celebrated philosopher, and a model of virtue, only by attending a single moral lecture. Indeed, said Mr. Merton, I am ashamed to confess that the various employments and amusements in which I have passed the greater part of my life, have not afforded me as much leisure for reading as I could wish. You will therefore oblige me very much by repeating the story you allude to.

The Story of POLEMO.

Polemo, faid Mr. Barlow, was a young man of Athens, so distinguished by his excesses, that he was the aversion of all the discreter part of the city. He led a life of continual intemperance and dissipation. His days were given up to feasting and amusements, his nights to riot and intoxication. He was constantly surrounded by a set of loose young men who imitated and encouraged his vices; and when they had totally drowned the little reason they possest, totally drowned the little reason they possest, in copious draughts of wine, they were accustomed to fally out, and practise every species of absurd and licentious frolic. One morning they were thus wandering about, after having spent the night as usual, when they beheld a great concourse of people that were listening to the discourses of a celebrated philosopher named Xenocrates. The greater part of the young men, who still retained some sense of shame, were so struck with this spectacle, that they turned out of the way, but Polemo, who was more daring and abandoned than the rest, pressed forward into the midst of the audience. His figure was too remarkable not to attract universal notice: for his head was crowned with notice; for his head was crowned with flowers, his robe hung negligently about him, and his whole body was reeking with perfumes; besides, his look and manners were such as very little qualified him for such a company. Many of the audience were so displeased at this interruption, that they were ready to treat the young man with great severity, but the venerable philosopher prevailed upon them not to molest the intruder, and calmly continued his discourse, which happened to be upon the dignity and advantage advantage of temperance. As he proceeded, he descanted upon this subject with so much force and eloquence, that the young man became more composed and attentive, as it were, in spite of himself. Presently, as the sage grew still more animated in his repre-fentation of the shameful slavery which attends the giving way to our passions, and the sublime happiness of reducing them all to order, the countenance of Polemo began to change, and the expression of it to be softened. He cast his eyes in mournful filence upon the ground, as if in deep re-pentance for his own contemptible conduct. Still the philosopher increased in vehemence; he seemed to be animated with the facred genius of the art which he profest, and to exercise an irresistible power over the minds of his hearers. He drew the portrait of an ingenuous and modest young man, that had been bred up to virtuous toils and manly hardiness. He painted him triumphant over all his paffions, and trampling upon human fears and weaknefs. Should his country be invaded, you fee him fly to its defence, and ready to pour forth all his blood. Calm and composed he appears with a terrible beauty in the front of danger, the ornament and bulwark of his country. The thickest squadrons are penetrated by his resistless valour, and he points the paths of victory to his admiring followers. Should he fall in battle, how glorious is his lot! to be cut off in the honourable discharge of his duty, to be wept by all the brave and virtuous, and to furvive in the eternal records of fame !-While Xenocrates was thus discoursing, Polemo feemed to be transported with a facred enthusiasm; his eyes flashed fire, his countenance glowed with martial indignation, and the whole expression of his person was changed. Presently, the philosopher, who had remarked the effects of his difcourse, painted in no less glowing colours the life and manners of an effeminate young man. Unhappy youth, faid he, what words shall I find equal to thy abasement? Thou art the reproach of thy parents, the difgrace of thy country, the fcorn or pity of every generous mind. How is nature difhonoured in thy person, and all her choicest gifts abortive! That strength which would have rendered thee the glory of thy city, and the terror of her foes, is basely thrown away on luxury and intemperance! thy youth and beauty are waited in riot and prematurely blasted by disease. Instead of the eye of fire, the port of intrepidity, the step of modest firmness, a squalid paleness sits upon thy face, a bloated corpulency enfeebles thy limbs, and prefents a picture of human nature in its most abject state. But hark! the trumpet founds; a favage band of unrelenting enemies have furrounded the city, and are prepared to scatter stames and ruin through the whole! The virtuous youth that have been educated to nobler cares, arm with generous emulation, and fly to its defence. How lovely do they appear, dreft in resplendent arms, and moving flowly on in a close, impenetrable phalanx! They are animated by every motive which can give energy to an human breaft, and lift it to the fublimest atchievements. Their hoary fires, their venerable magistrates, the beauteous forms of trembling virgins, attend them to the war, with prayers and acclamations. Go forth, ye generous bands, secure to meet the rewards of victory, or the repose of honourable death! Go forth, ye generous bands, but unaccompanied by the wretch I have described. His feeble arm refuses to bear the ponderous shield; the pointed spear sinks feebly from his grasp; he trembles at the noise and tumult of the war, and flies like the hunted hart to lurk in shades and darkness. Behold him rouzed from his midnight orgies, reeking with wine and odours, and crowned with flowers, the only trophies of his warfare; he hurries with trembling steps across the city; his voice, his gait, his whole deportment proclaim the abject flave of intemperance, and stamp indelible infamy upon his name. While Xenocrates was thus discoursing, Polemo listened with fixt attention: the former animation of his countenance gave way to a visible dejection; presently his lips trembled and his cheeks grew pale; he was lost in melancholy recollection, and a filent tear was observed to trickle down. But when the philosopher described a character so like his own, shame feemed to take intire possession of his foul, and rouzing, as from a long and painful lethargy, he foftly raised his hands to his head, and tore away the chaplets of flowers, the monuments of his effeminacy and difgrace: he feemed intent to compose his dress into a more decent form, and wrapped his robe about him, that before hung loofely waving with an air of studied effeminacy. But when Xenocrates had finished his difcourse, Polemo approached him with all the humility of conscious guilt, and begged to become his disciple; telling him that he had had that day gained the most glorious conquest that had ever been atchieved by reason and philosophy, by inspiring with the love of virtue a mind that had been hitherto plunged in folly and sensualty. Xenocrates embraced the young man, encouraged him in such a laudable design, and admitted him among his disciples. Nor had he ever reason to repent of his facility, for Polemo from that hour abandoned all his former companions and vices, and by his uncommon ardor for improvement, very soon became as celebrated for virtue and wisdom as he had before been for every contrary quality.

Thus, added Mr. Barlow, you fee howlittle reason there is to despair of youth, even in the most disadvantageous circumstances. It has been justly observed that few know all they are capable of; the seeds of different qualities frequently lie concealed in the character, and only wait for an opportunity of exerting themselves; and itis the great business of education to apply such motives to the imagination, as may stimulate it to laudable exertions. For thus the same activity of mind, the same impetuosity of temper, which, by being improperly applied, would only form a wild, ungoverngovernable character, may produce the fleadiest virtue, and prove a bleffing both to the individual and his country.

I am infinitely obliged to you for this story, faid Mr. Merton, and as my fon will certainly find a Xenocrates in you, I wish that you may have reason to think him in some degree a Polemo. But, since you are fo kind as to prefent me with these agreeable hopes, do not leave the work unfinished, but tell me what you think the best method of treating him in his present critical situation. That, faid Mr. Barlow, must depend, I think, upon the workings of his own mind. He has always appeared to me generous and humane, and to have a fund of natural goodness amid all the faults which fpring up too luxuriantly in his character. It is impossible that he should not be at present possest with the keenest shame for his own behaviour. It will be your first part to take advantage of these sentiments, and, instead of a fleeting and transitory fen-fation, to change them into fixt and active principles. Do not at present say much to him upon the subject. Let us both be attentive to the filent workings of his mind, and regulate our behaviour accordingly.

This

This conversation being finished, Mr. Merton introduced Mr. Barlow to the company in the other room. Mrs. Merton, who now began to be a little staggered in some of the opinions she had been most fond of, received him with uncommon civility, and all the rest of the company treated him with the greatest respect. But Tommy, who had lately been the oracle and the admiration of all this brilliant circle, appeared to have lost all his vivacity. He indeed advanced to meet Mr. Barlow with a look of tenderness and gratitude, and made the most respectful answers to all his inquiries; but his eyes were involuntarily turned to the ground, and filent melancholy and dejection were visible in his face. Mr. Barlow remarked with the greatest pleasure these signs of humility and contrition, and pointed them out to Mr. Merton the first time he had an opportunity of speaking to him without being overheard; adding, that unless he was much deceived, Tommy would foon give ample proofs of the natural goodness of his character, and reconcile himself to all his friends. Mr. Merton heard this observation with the greatest pleasure, and now began to entertain some hopes of feeing it accomplished. After

After the dinner was over, most of the young gentlemen went away to their refpective homes. Tommy seemed to have lost much of the enthusiasm which he had lately felt for his polite and accomplished friends; he even appeared to feel a secret joy at their departure, and answered with a visible coldness all their professions of regard and repeated invitations. Even Mrs. Compton herself and Miss Matilda, who were also departing, found him as insensible as the rest; though they did not spare the most extravagant praises and the warmest professions of regard.

And now the ceremonies of taking leave being over, and most of the visitors departed, a sudden solitude seemed to have taken possession of the house which was lately the seat of noise, and bustle, and session. Mr. and Mrs. Merton and Mr. Barlow were left alone with Miss Simmons and Tommy, and one or two others of the smaller gentry who had not yet returned to their friends. As Mr. Barlow was not fond of cards, Mr. Merton proposed, after the tea-table was removed, that Miss Simmons, who was famous for reading well, should entertain the company with some little tale or history, adapted to the comprehension even of the youngest. Mis Simmons excused herself with the greatest modesty, but upon Mrs. Merton's joining in the request, she instantly complied, and fetching down a book, read the following story of SOPHRON and TIGRANES.

. SOPHRON and Tigranes were the children of two neighbouring shepherds that fed their flocks in that part of Asia which borders upon mount Lebanon. They were accustomed to each other from their earliest infancy, and the continual habit of conversing at length produced a tender and intimate friendship. Sophron was the larger and more robust of the two; his look was firm, but modest, his countenance placid, and his eyes were fuch as inspired confidence and attachment. He excelled most of the youth of the neighbourhood in every species of violent exercise, such as wrestling, boxing, and whirling heavy weights; but his triumphs were constantly mixed with so much humanity and courtesy, that even those who found themselves vanquished could feel no envy towards their conqueror. On the contrary, Tigranes was of a character totally different. His body was less frong than than that of Sophron, but excellently proportioned, and adapted to every species of fatigue. His countenance was full of fire, but displeased by an excess of considence; and his eyes sparkled with sense and meaning, but bore too great an expression of un-controuled sierceness. Nor were these two youths less different in the application of their faculties than in the nature of them; for Tigranes seemed to be possessed by a restless spirit of commanding all his equals, while Sophron, contented with the enjoy-ment of tranquility, defired nothing more than to avoid oppression.

Still as they affifted their parents in leading every morning their flocks to pasture, they entertained each other with rural fports, or, laid under the shade of arching rocks, during the heat of the day, conver-fed with all the ease of childish friendship. Their observations were not many; they were chiefly drawn from the objects of nature which furrounded them, or from the simple modes of life to which they had been witness; but even here the diversity of their characters was sufficiently expressed. See, said Tigranes one day, as he cast his eyes upwards to the cliffs of a neighbouring rock, that eagle which rises into the im-Vol. III. menfe mense regions of air, till he absolutely soars beyond the reach of fight; were I a bird, I should choose to resemble him, that I might traverse the clouds with the rapidity of a whirlwind, and dart like lightning upon my prey. That eagle, answered Sophron, is the emblem of violence and injustice; he is the enemy of every bird, and even of every beaft that is weaker than himfelf: were I to choose, I should prefer the life of yonder swan, that moves so smoothly and inoffensively along the river; he is strong enough to defend himself from injury, without oppressing others; and, therefore, he is neither feared nor infulted by other animals. While he was yet speaking, the eagle, who had been hovering in the air, darted suddenly down at some distance, and seizing a lamb, was bearing it away in his cruel talons; when, almost in the same instant, the shepherd, who had been watching all his motions from a neighbouring hill, let fly an arrow from his bow, with fo unerring an aim that it pierced the body of the bird, and brought him headlong to the ground, writhing in the agonies of death. This, faid Sophron, I have often heard is the fate of ambitious people; while they are endea-vouring to mount beyond their fellows, they are stopped by some unforeseen misfortune. For my part, faid Tigranes, I had rather perish in the middle of the sky, than enjoy an age of life, basely chained down and grovelling upon the surface of the earth. What we either may enjoy, answered Suphron, is in the hand of Heaven; but may I rather creep, during life, than mount to commit injustice and oppress the innocent!

In this manner passed the early years of the two friends. As they grew up to manhood the difference of their tempers became more visible, and gradually alienated them from each other. Tigranes began to despise the uniform labours of a shepherd, and the humble occupations of the country. His sheep were neglected, and frequently wandered over the plains, without a leader to guard them in the day or bring them back at night. The young man was in the mean time employed in climbing rocks, or traverfing the forest, to seek for eagles nests, or pierce with his arrows the different wild animals which inhabit the woods. If he heard the horn of the hunter, or the cry of hounds, it was impossible to restrain his eagerness. He regarded neither the summer's fun nor the winter's frost while he was pursuing his game. The thickest woods, the steepest mountains, the deepest rivers, were unable to stop him in his career. He triumphed over every danger and difficulty with fuch an invincible courage as made him at once an object of terror and admiration to all the youth in the neighbourhood. His friend Sophron alone beheld his exploits neither with terror nor admiration. Of all his comrades Sophron was the only one whom Tigranes still continued to respect, for he knew that, with a gentleness of temper which scarcely any thing could exasperate, he possessed the firmest courage, and a degree of bodily strength which rendered that courage invincible. He affected, indeed, to despise the virtuous moderation of his friend, and ridiculed it with some of his loofer comrades as an abject pufilla-nimity; but he felt himfelf humbled whenever he was in his company as before a fuperior being, and therefore gradually estranged himself from his society.

Sophron, on the contrary, entertained the fincerest regard for his friend, but he knew his defects, and trembled for the consequences which the violence and ambition of his character might one day produce. Whenever Tigranes abandoned his flocks or left his rustic tasks undone, Sophron had the goodness to supply whatever he had omitted. Such was the vigour of his constitution that he was indefatigable in every labour, nor did he ever exert his force more willingly than in performing these voluntary duties to his absent friend. Whenever he met with Tigranes, he accosted him in the gentlest manner, and endeavoured to win him back to his former habits and manners. He represented to him the injury he did his parents, and the disquietude he occasioned in their minds, by thus abandoning the duties of his profession. He sometimes, but with the greatest mildness, hinted at the coldness with which Tigranes treated him; and reminded his friend of the pleafing intercourfe of their childhood. But all his remonstrances were vain; Tigranes heard him at first with coolness, then with impatience or contempt, and, at last, avoided him altogether.

Sophron had a lamb which he had formerly faved from the devouring jaws of a wolf, who had already bitten him in feveral places, and destroyed his dam. The tenderness with which this benevolent young man had nursed and fed him during his infancy had so attached him to his master, that he feemed to prefer his fociety to that of his own species. Wherever Sophron went, the faithful lamb accompanied him like his dogs, lay down beside him when he reposed, and followed close behind when he drove the rest of the slock to pasture. Sophron was equally attached to his dumb companion; he often diverted himself with his innocent gambols, fed him with the choicest herbs out of his hands, and when he stept at night, the lamb was sure to repose beside him.

It happened about this time, that Tigranes, as he was one day exploring the woods, discovered the den of a she-wolf, in which she had left her young ones while she went out to search for prey. By a caprice that was natural to his temper, he chose out the largest of the whelps, carried it home to his house, and brought it up as is it had been an useful and harmless animal. While it was yet but young, it was incapable of doing mischies; but as it increased in age and strength, it began to shew signs of a bloody and untameable disposition, and made all the neighbouring shepherds tremble for the safety of their slocks. But, as the courage and sierceness of Tigranes had now rendered him formidable to all his affociates, sociates, and the violence of his temper made him impatient of all opposition, they did not speak to him upon the subject; and as to his own parents, he had long learned to treat them with indifference or contempt. Sophron alone, who was not to be awed by fear, observing the just apprehensions of the neighbourhood, undertook the task of expostulating with his friend, and endeavoured to prevail upon him to part with a beast so justly odious, and which might in the end prove fatal whenever his natural rage should break out into open acts of flaughter. Ti-granes heard him with a fneer of derision, and only answered; that, if a parcel of mi-ferable rustics diverted themselves with keeping sheep, he, who had a more elevated foul, might furely entertain a nobler animal for his diversion. But, should that nobler animal prove a public mischief, coolly re-plied Sophron, you must expect that he will be treated as a public enemy. Woe be to the man, answered Tigranes, brandishing his javelin and sternly frowning, that shall dare to meddle with any thing that belongs to me! Saying this, he turned his back upon Sophron, and left him with disdain.

It was not long before the very event took place which had been so long foreseen.

The wolf of Tigranes, either impelled by the accidental tafte of blood, or by the natural fierceness of his own temper, fell one day upon the sheep with such an unexpected degree of fury, that he flaughtered thirty of them before it was possible to prevent him. Sophron happened at that time to be within view; he ran with amazing fwiftness to the place, and found the favage bathed in blood, tearing the carcase of a lamb which he had just slain. At the approach of the daring youth the wolf began to utter a dismal cry, and, quitting his prey, seemed to prepare himself for a slaughter of another kind. Sophron was entirely unarmed, and the fize and fury of the beaft which rushed forward to attack him might well have excufed him had he declined the combat. But he, confulting only his native courage, wrapped his shepherd's cloak around his lest arm to relitt the full onset of his enemy, and, with a determined look and nimble pace, advanced towards his threatening adverfacy. In an instant the wolf sprang upon him, with an horrid yell; but Sophron nimbly eluded his attack, and, fuddenly throwing his vigorous arms about the body of his adverfary, compelled him to struggle for his own fafety. It was then that he uttered tered cries more dreadful than before; and as he writhed about in all the agitations of pain and madness, he gnashed his terrible teeth with impotent attempts to bite; while the blood and foam which issued from his jaws rendered his figure still more horrible han before. But Sophron, with undaunted courage, still maintained his hold, and, grasping him with irresistible strength, prevented him from using either his teeth or claws in his own defence. It was not long before the struggles and violence of the wolf grew perceptibly weaker from satigue, and he seemed to wish to decline a farther combat with fo formidable a foe, could he have found means to escape. Sophron then collected all his strength, and, seizing his sainting adversary by the neck and throat, grasped him still tighter in his terrible hands, till the beast, incapable either of disengaging himself or breathing, yieldedup the contest and his life together. It was almost in this moment that Tigranes passed that way, and unexpectedly was witness to the triumphs of Sophron, and the miserable end of his favourite. Inflamed with pride and indignation, he uttered dreadful imprecations against his friend, who, in vain, attempted to explain the transaction; and, rushing B 5 rushing upon him with all the madness of inveterate hate, aimed a javelin at his bofom. Sophron was calm as he was brave; he saw the necessity of defending his own life against the attacks of a perfidious friend; and, with a nimble spring, at once eluded the weapon and closed with his antagonist. The combat was then more equal, for each was reduced to depend upon his own strength and activity. They struggled for some time with all the efforts which disappointed rage could inspire on the one side, and a virtuous indignation on the other. length the fortune, or rather the force and coolness of Sophron, prevailed over the blind impetuous fury of Tigranes: he at once exerted his whole remaining strength with fuch fuccess, that he hurled his adversary to the ground, where he lay bleeding, van-quished, and unable to rise. Thou scarcely, said Sophron, deservest thy life from my hands, who couldft fo wantonly and unjustly attempt to deprive me of mine; however, I will rather remember thy early merits than thy recent injuries. No, replied the raging Tigranes, load me not with thy odious benefits, but rather rid me of a life which I abhor, fince thou hast robbed me of my honour. I will never hurt thee, repi e d plied Sophron, but in my own just defence; live to make a better use of life, and to have juster ideas of honour. Saving this, he affisted Tigranes to rise, but finding his temper sull of implacable resentment, he turned another way, and left him to go home alone.

It was not long after this event, that a company of foldiers marched across the plains where Sophron was feeding his flocks, and halted to refresh themselves under the shade of some spreading trees. The officer who commauded them was struck with the comely figure and expressive countenance of Sophron. He called the young man to him and endeavoured to inflame him with a military ardor, by fetting before him the glory which might be acquired by arms, and ridiculing the obscurity of a country life. When he thought he had sufficiently excited his admiration, he proposed to him that he should enrol himself in his company, and promifed him every encouragement which he thought most likely to engage the passions of a young man. Sophron thanked him with humility for his offers, but told him, that he had an aged father, who was now become incapable of maintaining himself; and therefore that he could R 6 accept accept of no offers, however advantageous they might appear, which would interfere with the discharge of his duty. The officer replied, and ridiculed the scruples of the young man; but, finding him inflexible in his refolution, he at last turned from him with an air of contempt, and called his men to follow him, muttering as he went reflections upon the stupidity and cowardice of Sophron. The party had not proceeded far, before, by ill fortune, they came to the place where his favourite lamb was feeding; and, as he had not yet learned to dread the cruelty of the human species, he advanced towards them with all the confidence of unfuspicious innocence. This is a lucky accident, cried one of the foldiers, with a brutal fatisfaction; fortune was not willing that we should go without a supper, and has therefore fent us a prefent. A happy exchange, answered a second; a sat sheep instead of a lubberly shepherd; and the coward will no doubt think himself happy to fleep in a whole fkin at fo fmall an expence. Saying this, he took the lamb, and bore it away in triumph; uttering a thousand threats and executations against the maser, if he should dare to reclaim it. Sophron was not fo far removed as to escape the

the fight of the indignity which was offered him. He followed the troop with fo much fwiftness, that it was not long before he overtook the foldier who was bearing away his friend, and, from his load, marched rather behind the rest. When Sophron approached him, he accosted him in the gentlest manner, and befought him, in words that might have touched any one but a savage, to restore his favourite. He even offered, when he found nothing else would avail, to purchase back his own property with something of greater value. But the barbarous foldier, inured to scenes of misery, and little accustomed to yield to human entreaties, only laughed at his complaints, and loaded him with additional infults. At length, he began to be tired with his importunities, and, drawing his fword, and waving it before the eyes of Sophron, threatened that, if he did not depart immediately, he would use him as he intended to do the lamb. 'And do you think, answered Sophron, that, while I have an arm to lift, or a drop of blood in my veins, I will fuffer you, or any man, to rob me of what I value more than life? The foldier, exasperated at fuch an infolent reply, as he termed it, aimed a blow at Sophron with his fword, which

which he turned afide with a flick he held in his hand, fo that it glanced inoffensively down; and before he could recover the use of his weapon, Sophron, who was infinitely ftronger, closed in with him, wrested it out of his hands, and hurled him roughly to the ground. Some of the comrades of the vanquished foldier came in an instant to his affiftance, and, without inquiring into the merits of the cause, drew their swords, and began to affail the undaunted young man. But he, brandishing the weapon which he had just seized, appeared ready to defend himself with so much strength and courage, that they did not choose to come too near. While they were thus engaged, the officer, who had turned back at the first noise of the affray, approached, and, ordering his men to defift, enquired into the occasion of the contest. Sophron then recounted with so much modelty and respect, the indignities and infults he had received, and the unprovoked attack of the foldier, which had obliged him to defend his own life, that the officer, who had a real respect for courage, was charmed with the behaviour of the young man. He therefore reproved his men for their disorderly manners, praised the intrepidity of Sophron, and ordered his lamb lamb to be restored to him, with which he joyfully departed.

Sophron was fearcely out of fight, when Tigranes, who was then by accident returning from the chace, met the fame party upon their march. Their military attire and glittering arms inftantly struck his mind with admiration. He stopped to gaze upon them as they passed, and the officer, who remarked the martial air and well-proportioned limbs of Tigranes, entered into conversation with him, and made him the same proposals which he had before done to Sophron. Such incentives were irrefistible to a vain and ambitious mind: the young man in an instant forgot his friends, his country, and his parents, and marched away with all the pleasure that strong presumption and aspiring hopes could raise. Nor was it long before he had an opportunity of signalizing his intrepidity. Asia was at that time overran by numerous bands of favage warriors under different and independent chiefs. That country, which has in every age been celebrated for the mildness of the climate and the fertility of the foil, seems to be deftined to groan under all the horrors of eternal servitude. Whether these effects are merely produced by fortune, or whether the natural natural advantages it enjoys have a necessary tendency to soften the minds of the inhabitants to sloth and effeminacy, it is certain that the people of Asia have in general been the unresisting prey of every invader. At this time, several fierce and barbarous nations had broken in upon its territory; and, after covering its fertile plains with carnage and desolation, were contending with each other for the superiority.

Under the most enterprizing of these ri-val chiefs was Tigranes now enrolled, and in the very first engagement at which he was prefent, he gave fuch uncommon proofs of valour, that he was diftinguished by the general with marks of particular regard, and became the admiration of all his comrades. - Under the banners of this adventurous warrior did Tigranes toil with various fortunes, during the space of many years. Sometimes victorious in the fight, sometimes baffled; at one time crowned with conquest and glory, at another beset with dangers, covered with wounds, and hunted like a wild beaft through rocks and forests. Yet still the native courage of his temper sustained his spirits and kept him firm in the prosession which he had chosen. At length, in a decifive battle in which the chieftain under whom whom Tigranes had enlifted contended with the most powerful of his rivals, he had the honour of retrieving the victory, when his own party feemed totally routed; and, after having penetrated the thickest squadrons of the enemy, to kill their general with his own hand. From this moment he feemed to be in possession of all that his ambition could desire. He was appointed general of all the troops, under the chief himself, whose repeated victories had rendered him equal in power to the most celebrated monarchs. Nor did his fortune stop even here; for after a number of successive battles, in which his party were generally victorious by his experience and intrepidity, he was upon the unexpected death of the chief, unanimously chosen by the whole nation to fucceed him.

In the mean time Sophron, free from envy, avarice, or ambition, pursued the natural impulse of his character, and contented himself with a life of virtuous obscurity. He pass'd his time in rural labours, in watching his flocks, and in attending with all the duty of an affectionate child upon his aged parents. Every morning he rose with the sun, and spreading his innocent arms to Heaven, thanked that Being which has created created all nature, for the continuance of life and health, and all the bleffings he enjoyed. His piety and virtue were rewarded with every thing which a temperate and rational mind can ask. All his rural labours succeeded in the amplest manner; his slocks were the fairest, the most healthy and numerous of the district; he was loved and esteemed by the youth of the neighbourhood, and equally respected by the aged, who pointed him out as the example of every virtue to their families. But what was more dear than all the rest to such a mind as Sophron's, was to see himself the joy, the comfort, and support of his parents, who frequently embraced him with tears, and supplicated the Deity to reward such duty and affection with all his choicest bleffings.

Nor was his humanity confined to his own species; the innocent inhabitants of the forest were safe from the pursuit of Sephron, and all that lived under his protection were sure o meet with distinguished tenderness. It is tough, said Sophron, that the innocent en pplies me with his sleece, to form theep sure garments, and defend me from wint I will not bereave him of his litthe cold; or stop his harmless gambols on the life, n to gratify a guilty sensuality. It the green, is furely enough that the stately heifer affords me copious streams of pure and wholesome food; I will not arm my hand against her innocent existence; I will not pollute myself with her blood, nor tear her warm and panting stess with a cruely that we abhor even in favage beafts. More wholesome, more adapted to human life are the spontaneous fruits which liberal nature produces for the sufferance of man, or which the earth affords to recompense his labours.

Here the interest and concern which had been long visible in Tommy's face could no longer be represt, and tears began to trickle down his cheeks. What is the matter, my darling, faid his mother, what is there in the account of this young man that so deeply interests and affects you?—Alas! said Tommy, mamma, it reminds me of poor faid Tommy, mamma, it reminds me of poor Harry Sandford; just such another good young man will he be, when he is as old as Sophron; and I, and I, added he sobbing, am just such another worthless, ungrateful wretch as Tigranes. But Tigranes, said Mrs. Merton, you see, became a great and powerful man, while Sophron remained only a poor and ignorant shepherd. What does that signify, mamma? said Tommy. For my part, I begin to find that it is not always the greatest people that are the best or happiest; and as to ignorance, I cannot think that Sophron, who understood his duty so well to his parents, and to God, and to all the world, could be called ignorant, and very likely he could read and write better than Tigranes, in spite of all his pomp and grandeur; for I am fure there is not one of the young gentlemen that went home to-day, that reads as well as Harry Sandford, or has half his understanding. Mr. Merton could hardly help smiling at Tommy's conjecture about Sophron's reading, but he selt the greatest pleasure at seeing such a change in his sentiments, and looking at him with more cordiality than he had done before, he told him that he was very happy to find him fo fensible of his faults, and hoped he would be equally ready to amend them. Miss Simmons then continued her narrative:

If Sophron ever permitted himself to shed the blood of living creatures, it was of those ferocious animals that wage continual war with every other species. Amid the mountains which he inhabited, there were rugged cliffs and inaccessible caverns, which afforded retreat to wolves, and bears, and tygers. Sometimes, amid the storms and shows fnows of winter, they felt themselves pinched by hunger, and fell with almost irresistible fury upon the nearest flocks and herds. Not only sheep and oxen were slaughtered in these dreadful and unexpected attacks, but even the shepherds themselves were for-quently the victims of their rage. If there was time to affemble for their defence, the boldest of the youth would frequently seize their arms, and give battle to the invaders. In this warfare, which was equally just and honourable, Sophron was always foremost; his unequalled strength and courage made all the youth adopt him as their leader, and march with confidence under his command. And so successful were his expeditions that he always returned loaded with the fkins of vanquished enemies, and, by his vigilance and intrepidity, at length either killed or drove away most of the beasts from whom any danger was to be feared.

It happened one day that Sophron had been following the chace of a wolf which had made fome depredations upon the flocks, and, in the ardour of his purfuit, was feparated from all his companions. He was too well acquainted with the roughest parts of the neighbouring mountains, and too indifferent to danger, to be disturbed at this circumstance; he, therefore, followed his flying foe with so much impetuosity, that he completely lost every track and mark with which he was acquainted. As it is difficult, in a wild and uncultivated district, to find the path again, when once it is loft, Sophron only wandered the farther from his home the more he endeavoured to return. He found himself bewildered and entangled in a dreary wilderness, where he was every instant stopped by torrents that tumbled from the neighbouring cliffs, or in danger of slipping down precipices of an immense height. He was alone, in the midft of a gloomy forest where human industry had never penetrated, nor the woodman's ax been heard, fince the moment of its creation; to add to his diffress, the fetting fun disappeared in the west, and the shades of night gathered gradually round, accompanied with the roar of favage beafts. So-phron found himfelf befet with terrors, but his foul was incapable of fear; he poized his javelin in his hand, and forced his way through every opposition, till at length, with infinite difficulty, he disengaged himfelf from the forest, just as the last glimmer of light was yet visible in the skies. But it was in vain that he had thus escaped; he 9 cast his eyes around, but could discern nothing but an immense track of country, rough with rocks, and overhung with forests; but destitute of every mark of cultivation or inhabitants. He, however, purfive tivation or inhabitants. He, nowever, purfued his way along the fide of the mountain, till he descended into a pleasant valley, free from trees and watered by a winding stream. Here he was going to repose for the remainder of the night, under the crag of an impending rock, when a rising gleam of light darted suddenly into the skies from a considerable distance, and attracted his curiofity. Sophron looked towards the quarter whence it came, and plainly difcerned that it was a fire, kindled either by some benighted traveller like himself, or by some less innocent wanderers of the dark. He determined to approach the light, but knowing the unsettled state of all the neighbouring districts, he thought it prudent to advance with caution. He therefore made a confiderable circuit, and by clambering along the higher grounds, discovered an hanging wood, under whose thick covert he approached without being discovered, within a little distance of the fire. He then preceived that a party of foldiers were re-posing round a flaming pile of wood, and

-carousing at their ease; all about was strewn the plunder which they had accumulated in their march, and in the midst was seated a venerable old man, accompanied by a beautiful young woman. Sophron eafily comprehended, by the dejection of their countenances, and the tears which trickled down the maiden's cheeks, as well as by the infolence with which they were treated, that they were prisoners. The virtuous in-dignation of his temper was instantly excit-ed, and he determined to attempt their de-liverance. But this, in spite of all his intrepidity, he perceived was no easy matter to accomplish. He was alone and weakly armed; his enemies, though not numerous, too many for him to flatter himfelf with any rational hope of success by open force; and should he make a fruitless effort, he might rashly throw his life away, and only aggravate the diftresses he sought to cure. With this confideration he restrained his natural impetuofity, and at length, determined to attempt by stratagem, what he thought could scarcely be performed by force. He therefore filently withdrew, and skirted the side of the wood which had concealed him, carefully remarking every circumstance of the way, till he had ascended a mouna mountain, which immediately fronted the camp of the foldiers, at no confiderable distance. He happened to have by his side a kind of battle-axe which they use in the chase of bears; with this he applied himself to lopping the branches of trees, collecting at the fame time all the fallen ones he could find, till, in a short time, he had reared several piles of wood upon the most conspicuous part of the mountain, and full in the view of the foldiers. He then eafily kindled a blaze by rubbing two decayed branches to-gether, and in an instant all the piles were blazing with so many streams of light, that the neighbouring hills and forests were illuminated with the gleam. Sophron knew the nature of man, always prone to fudden impressions of fear and terror, more particularly amid the obscurity of the night, and promised himself the amplest success from his stratagem. In the mean time he hastened back with all the speed he could use, till he reached the very wood where he had lurked before; he then raifed his voice, which was naturally loud and clear, and shouted several times fuccessively with all his exertion. An hundred echoes from the neighbouring cliffs and caverns returned the found, with a reverberation that made it appear like the Vol. III. noife noise of a mighty squadron. The soldiers, who had been alarmed by the fudden blaze of so many fires, which they attributed to a numerous band of troops, were now imprest with such a panic that they sled in confusion. They imagined themselves sur-rounded by their enemies, who were bursting in on every fide; and fled with fo much precipitation that they were dispersed in an instant, and left the prisoners to themselves. Sophron, who saw from a small distance all their motions, did not wait for them to be undeceived, but running to the spot they had abandoned, explained in a few words to the trembling and amazed captives, the nature of his stratagem, and exhorted them to fly with all the swiftness they were able to exert. Few intreaties were necessary to prevail upon them to comply; they therefore arose and followed Sophron, who led them a confiderable way up into the mountains, and when he thought them out of the immediate danger of pursuit, they sheltered themselves in a rocky cavern, and determined there to wait for the light of the morning.

When they were thus in a place of fafety, the venerable old man feized the hand of Sophron, and, bedewing it with his tears, gave way to the strong emotions of gratitude, which overwhelmed his mind. Generous youth, faid he, I know not by what extraordinary fortune you have thus been able to 'effect our deliverance, when we imagined ourselves out of the reach of human succour; but, if the uniform gratitude and affection of two human beings, who perhaps are not entirely unworthy your regard, can be any recompence for such a distinguished act of virtue, you may command our lives, and employ them in your fervice.

Father, answered Sophron, you infinitely over-rate the merits of the service which chance has enabled me to perform. I am but little acquainted with my fellow-creatures, as having always inhabited thefe mountains; but I cannot conceive that any other man who had been witness to your diffress would have refused to attempt your rescue. And, as to all the rest, the obscurity of the night, and peculiarity of the fituation, rendered it a work of little difficulty or danger. Sophron then recounted to his new friends the accident which had brought him to that unfrequented spot, and made him an unperceived witness of their captivity; he also explained the nature of the stratagem, by which, alone and unsupported, he had been enabled to disperse their enemies.

enemies. He added, that, if he appeared to have any little merit in their eyes, he should be amply recompensed by being admitted to their friendship and considence. With these mutual professions of esteem they thought it prudent to terminate a conversation, which, however agreeable, was not entirely free from danger, as some of their late oppressors might happen to distinguish their voices, and, thus directed to their lurking-place, exact a severe revenge for the terrors they had undergone.

With the first ray of morning the three companions arose, and Sophron, leading them along the skirts of the mountains where brushes and brush-wood concealed them from observation, and still following the windings of the river as a guide, they at length came to a cultivated spot, though deferted by its inhabitants from the fear of the party they had lately escaped. Here they made a slight and hasty repast upon some coarse provisions which they found, and instantly struck again into the woods, which they judged safer than the plain. But Sophron fortunately recollected that he had formerly visited this village with his sather, while yet a child, and before the country had suffered the rage of barbarous invasions. It was a long day's march from home, but, by exerting all their force, they at length arrived, through rough and fecret paths, at the hospitable cottage where Sophron and his parents dwelt. Here they were joyfully received, as the long absence of the young man had much alarmed his

of the young man had much alarmed his parents, and made all the hamlet anxious concerning his fafety. That night they comfortably reposed in a place of safety, and the next morning, after a plentiful but coarse repast, the father of Sophron again congratulated his guests upon their fortunate escape, and entreated them to let him hear the history of their missfortunes.

I can refuse nothing, said the venerable stranger, to persons to whom I am under such extraordinary obligations, although the history of my life is short and simple, and contains little worthy to be recited. My name is Chares, and I was born in one of the maritime cities of Asia, of opulent parents, who died while I was yet a youth. The loss of my parents, to whom I was most affectionately attached, made so strong an impression upon my mind, that I deteran impression upon my mind, that I deter-mined to seek relief in travel, and, for that purpose, sold my paternal estate, the price of which I converted into money and C_{3} jewels.

jewels, as being most portable. My father had been a man diftinguished for his know-ledge and abilities, and from him I imbibed an early detire of improvement, which has always been my greatest comfort and sup-port. The first place, therefore, which I visited was Ægypt, a country renowned in every age for its invention of all the arts which contribute to support or adorn human life. There I resided several years, giving up my time to the study of philosophy, and to the conversation of the many eminent men who reforted thither from all the regions of the world. This country is one immense plain, divided by the Nile, which is one of the noblest rivers in the world, and pours its tide along the middle of its territory. Every year, at a particular season, the stream begins gradually to swell, with such an increase of waters, that at length it rises over its banks, and the whole extent of Ægypt becomes an immense lake, where buildings, temples, and civies appears a floating upon temples, and cities, appear as floating upon the inundation. Nor is this event a subject of dread to the inhabitants: on the contrary, the overflowing of their river is a day of public rejoicing to all the natives, which they celebrate with fongs and dances, and every symptom of extravagant joy. Nor is this this to be wondered at, when you are informed that this inundation renders the foil it covers the most abundant in the world. Whatever land is covered by the waters receives fuch an increase of fertility as never to disappoint the hopes of the industrious husbandman. The instant the waters have retired, the farmer returns to his fields and begins the operations of agriculture. These labours are not very difficult in a foft and yielding flime, fuch as the river leaves behind it. The feeds are fown and vegetate with inconceivable rapidity; and, in a few weeks, an abundant harvest of every kind of grain covers the land. For this reason, all the necessaries of life are easily procured by the innumerable multitudes which inhabit the country. Nor is the climate less favourable than the foil; for here an eternal fpring and summer seem to have fixed their abode. No frost, or snow, is ever known to chill the atmosphere, which is always perfumed with the smell of aromatic plants that grow on every side, and bring on a pleasing forgetfulness of human care. But, alas! these bleffings, great as they may appear, produce the effect of curses upon the inhabitants. The ease and plenty which they enjoy enervate their manners, and destroy all vigour both of body and mind. No one is here enflamed with the facred love of his country, or of public liberty; no one is inured to arms, or taught to prefer his honour to his life. The great business of existence is an inglorious indolence; a lethargy of mind, and a continual suspence from all exertion. The very children catchthe contagion from their parents; they are instructed in every effeminate art: to dance in foft, unmanly attitudes, to modulate their voice by musical instruments, and to adjust the floating drapery of their dress, these are the arts in which both sexes are instructed from their infancy. But no one is taught to wield the arms of men, to tame the noble fleeds in which the country abounds, to obferve his rank in war, or to bear the indispensable hardships of a military life. Hence this celebrated country, which has been in every age the admiration of mankind, is destined to the most degrading fervitude. A few thousand disciplined troops are fufficient to hold the many millions it contains in bondage, under which they groan, without ever conceiving the design of vindicating their natural rights by arms. Unhappy people! exclaimed Sophron, how useless to them are all the blessings of their climate!

climate! How much rather would I inhabit the stormy top of Lebanon, amid eternal snows and barrenness, than wallow in the vile fenfuality of fuch a country, or breathe an air infected by its vices!

Chares was charmed with the generous indignation of Sophron, and thus continued:—I was of the same opinion with yourfelf, and therefore determined to leave a country which all its natural advantages could not render agreeable, when I understood the manners of its inhabitants. But, before I quitted that part of the globe, my curiofity led me to vifit the neighbouring tribes of Arabia, a nation bordering upon the Ægyptians, but as different in spirits and manners as the hardy shepherds of these mountains from the effeminate natives of the plains. Ægypt is bounded on one fide by the sea; on every other, it is surrounded by immense plains or gentle eminences, which being beyond the reach of the fertilizing inundations of the Nile, have been, beyond all memory, converted into waste and barren fands by the excellive heat of the fun. I, therefore, made preparations for my journey, and hired a guide, who was to furnish me with beasts of burthen, and accompany me across those dreary deferts. We accordingly began our march, mounted each upon a camel, which are found much more useful than horses in such a burning climate.

Indeed, faid Tommy here to Mr. Barlow, I am forry to interrupt the flory, but I shall be much obliged to you, fir, if you will inform me what kind of an animal a camel is.

The camel, answered Mr. Barlow, is chiefly found in those burning climates which you have heard described. His height is very great, rifing to fourteen or fifteen feet, reckoning to the top of his head. His legs are long and slender, his body not large, and his neck of an amaz-ing length. This animal is found, in no part of the world that we are acquainted with, wild or free, but the whole race is enflaved by man, and brought up to drudgery from the first moment of their existence. As foon as he is born, they feize him and force him to recline upon the ground, with his legs doubled up under his belly. To keep him in this attitude they extend a piece of canvas over his body, and fix it to the ground by laying heavy weights upon the edge. In this manner he is tutored to obedience, and taught to kneel down at the orders orders of his master, and receive the burthens which he is destined to transport. In his temper he is gentle and tractable, and his patience in bearing thirst and hunger is superior to that of any animal we are acquainted with. He is driven across the burning deserts, loaded with the merchandize of those countries, and frequently does not find even water to quench his thirst for several days. As to his food, it is nothing but the few herbs which are found in the least barren parts of the deserts, and prickly bushes, upon which he browzes as a delicacy of sometimes he does not find even these for many days, yet pursues his journey with a degree of patience which is hardly credible.

We mounted our camels, continued Chales, and foon had reached the confines of the fertile plains of Ægypt. The way, as we proceeded, grew fenfibly more dreary and difagreeable, yet was fometimes varied with little tufts of trees and feanty patches of herbage. But these at length entirely disappeared, and nothing was seen on every side but an immense extent of barren sands, destitute of vegetation, and parched by the continual heat of the sun. No sound was heard to interrupt the dreary silence that reigned around, no traces of inhabitants perceivable, and the gloomy uniformity of the prospect inspired the soul with melancholy. In the mean time, the fun feemed to shoot down perpendicular rays upon our heads, without a cloud to mitigate his violence. I felt a burning fever take possession of my body; my tongue was scorched with intolerable heat, and it was in vain I endeavoured to moisten my mouth with repeated draughts of water. At night we came to a little rifing ground, at the foot of which we perceived some aquatic herbs and a small quantity of muddy water, of which our camels took prodigious draughts. Here we spread our tents and encamped for the night. With the morning we pursued our journey, but had not proceeded far, before we saw a cloud of dust that seemed to rise along the defert; and, as we approached nearer, we eafily diftinguished the glitter of arms that reflected the rifing fun. This was a band of the Arabians that had discovered us and came to know our intentions. As they advanced, they spurred their horses, which are the most fleet and excellent in the world, and bounded along the defert with the lightness of an antelope; at the same time they brandished their lances, and feemed prepared alike for war or peace. But -1917

But when they faw that we had neither the intention, nor the power to commit hostilities, they stopped their coursers at the diftance of a few paces from us; and he, that appeared the chief, advanced, and, with a firm but mild tone of voice, enquired into the reason of our coming. It was then that I took the liberty of addressing him in his own language, to which I had for some time applied myself before my journey. I explained to him the curiosity which led me to observe in person the manners of a people, who are celebrated over the whole world, for having preserved their native simplicity unaltered and their liberty unviolated, amid the revolutions which agitate all the neighbouring nations. I then offered to him the loading of my camel, which I had brought not as being worthy his acceptance, but as a flight testimony of my regard; and con-cluded with remarking, that the fidelity of the Arabians in observing their engagements was unimpeached in a fingle instance; and therefore, relying upon the integrity of my own intentions, I had come a painful journey, unarmed, and almost alone, to put myfelf into their power, and demand the facred rights of hospitality. While

While I was thus speaking, he looked at me with a penetration that feemed to read into my very foul; and when I had finished, he extended his arm with a fmile of benevolence, and welcomed me to their tribe; telling me at the same time, that they admitted me as their guest and received me with the arms of friendship: that their method of life, like their manners, was coarse and fimple, but that I might confider myfelf as fafer in their tents, and more removed from violence or treachery, than in the crowded cities which I had left. of the squadron then approached, and all faluted me as a friend and brother. then struck off across the defert, and after a few hours march approached the encampment where they had left their wives and children.

This people is the most singular, and in many respects the most admirable of all that inhabit this globe of earth. All other nations are subject to revolutions and the various turns of fortune. Sometimes they wage successful wars; sometimes they improve in the arts of peace; now they are great and reverenced by their neighbours; and now, insulted and despised, they suffer all the miseries of servitude. The Arabians bians alone have never been known to vary in the smallest circumstance either of their internal policy or external fituation. They inhabit a climate which would be intolerable to the rest of the human species for its burning heat, and a foil which refuses to furnish any of the necessaries of life. Hence, they neither plough the earth, nor fow, nor depend upon corn, for their fustenance, nor are acquainted with any of the mechanic They live chiefly upon the milk of their herds and flocks, and fometimes eat their flesh. These burning deserts are ftretched out to an immense extent on every side, and these they consider as their common country, without having any fixed or permanent place of abode. Arid and barren as are these wilds in general, there are various spots which are more productive than the rest. Here are found supplies of water and some appearances of vegetation; and here the Arabians encamp till they have exhausted the spontaneous products of the foil. Besides, they vary their place of residence with the different seasons of the When they are in perfect friendship with their neighbours, they advance to the very edges of the defert, and find more ample supplies of moisture and herbage. If thev they are attacked or molested, the whole tribe is in motion in an instant, and seeks a refuge in their impenetrable recesses. Other nations are involved in various pursuits of war, or government, or commerce; they have made a thousand inventions of luxury necessary to their welfare, and the enjoyment of these they call happiness. The Arab is ignorant of all these things, or, if he knows them, despises their possession. All his wants, his passions, his desires, terminate in one object, and that object is the preservation of his liberty. For this purpose he contents himself with a bare sufficiency of the coarsest and fimplest food; and the finall quantity of cloathing which he requires in fuch a climate is fabricated by the women of the tribe, who milk the cattle and prepare the food of their husbands, and require no other pleafures than the pleasing interest of domestic cares. They have a breed of horses superior to any in the rest of the globe for gentleness, patience, and unrivalled swiftness. This is the particular passion and pride of the Arabian tribes. They are necessary to them in their warlike expeditions and in their courses along the deferts. If they are attacked, they mount their steeds, who bear them with the rapidity of a tempest, to avenge their injuries ; ries; or should they be overmatched in fight, they soon transport them beyond the possibility of pursuit. For this reason the proudest monarchs and greatest conquerors have in vain endeavoured to subdue them. Troops accustomed to the plenty of a cultivated country are little able to pursue these winged warriors, over the wide extent of their sandy wastes. Opprest with heat, fainting for want of water, and spent with the various difficulties of the way, the most numerous armies have been destroyed in such attempts; and those that survived the obstacles of nature, were easily overcome by the repeated attacks of the valiant natives.

While I was in this country, I was myfelf witness to an embassy that was sent from a neighbouring prince, who imagined the same of his exploits had struck the Arabians with terror, and disposed them to submission. The ambassador was introduced to the chief of the tribe, a venerable old man, undistinguished by any mark of ostentation from the rest, who received him sitting cross-legged at the door of his tent. He then began to speak, and in a long and studied harangue, described the power of his master, the invincible courage of his armies, the vast prosusion of arms, of warlike engines, and military stores, and concluded with a demand that the Arabians should submit to acknowledge him as their lord and pay a yearly tribute. At this proud speech, the younger part of the tribe began to frown with indignation and clash their weapons in token of defiance; but the chief himself, with a calm and minly composure, made this reply: I expected from the maturity of your age, and the gravity of your countenance, to have heard a rational difcourse, befitting you to propose and us to hear. When you dwelt fo long upon the power of your mafter, I also imagined that he had fent to us to propose a league of friendship and alliance, such as might become equals, and bind man more closely to his fellows. In this case the Arabians, although they neither want the affiftance, nor fear the attacks of any king or nation, would gladly have confented; because it has been always their favourite maxim neither to leave injuries unpunished, nor to be outdone in kindness and hospitality. But since you have come thus far to deliver a message, which must needs be disagreeable to the ears of free-born men, who acknowledge no superior upon earth, you may thus report the fentiments of the Arabians to him that fent

You

SANDFORD AND MERTON. 67

You may tell him, that as to the land which we inhabit, it is neither the gift of him nor any of his fore-fathers; we hold it from our ancestors, who received it in turn for theirs, by the common laws of nature, which has adapted particular countries and foils not only to man, but to all the various animals which she has produced. If, therefore, your king imagines that he has a right to retain the country which he and his people now inhabit, by the fame tenure do the Arabians hold the fovereignty of these barren sands; where the bones of their ancestors have been buried, even from the first creation of the world. But you have described to us in pompous language, the extraordinary power and riches of your king; according to you, he not only commands numerous and well-appointed troops of warlike men, furnished with every species of military stores, but he also possesses immense heaps of gold, silver, and other precious commodities, and his country affords him an inexhauftible supply of corn and oil and wine, and all the other conveniencies of life. If, therefore, this reprefentation be false, you must appear a vain and despicable babbler, who, being induced by no fufficient reason, have come hither of your own accord to amuse us, a plain and simple race of men, with specious tales and fables; but, if your words be true, your king must be equally unjust and foolish, who, already possessed of all these advantages, doth still infatiably grasp after more; and enjoying fo many good things with eafe and fecurity to himfelf, will rather put them all to the hazard, than repress the vain defires of his own intolerable avarice. As to the tribute which you have demanded, what you have already feen of the Arabians and their country may afford you a fufficient answer. You see that we have neither cities, nor fields, nor rivers, nor wine, nor oil; gold and filver are equally unknown among us; and the Arabians, abandoning all these things to other men, have, at the same time delivered themselves from the necessity of being flaves, which is the general law by which all other mortals retain their possessions. We have, therefore, nothing which we can fend as a tribute but the fands of these our deferts, and the arrows and lances with which we have hitherto defended them from all invaders. If these are treasures worthy of his acceptance, he may lead his conquering troops to take possession of our country. But

But he will find men who are not fostened by luxury, or vanquished by their own vices; orien, who prize their liberty at a dearer rate than all other/mortals do their riches or their lives; and to whom dishonour is more formidable than wounds and death. If he can vanquish such men, it will, however, become his prudence to restlect, whether he can vanquish the obstacles which nature herself has opposed to his ambition. In attempting to pass our deserts, he will have to struggle with famine and consuming thirst; from which no enemy has hitherto escaped, even when he has failed to perish by the arrows of the Arabians.

Happy and generous people, exclaimed Sophron, how well do they deserve the liberty they enjoy! With such sentiments they need not fear the attack of kings or conquerors. It is the vices of men, and not the weakness of their nature, that basely enslave them to their equals; and he that prizes liberty beyond a few contemptible pleasures of his senses, may be certain that no human force can ever bereave him of so great a good.

Such sentiments, replied Chares, convince me that I have not made a false estimate of the inhabitants of these mountainous districts. It is for this reason that I have been so particular in the description of Ægypt and Arabia. I wished to know whether the general spirit of indolence and pusillanimity had insected the hardy inhabitants of Lebanon: but from the generous enthusiasm which animates your countenance at the recital of noble actions, as well as from what I have experienced you are capable of attempting, I trust that these solitary scenes are uninfected with the vices that have deluged the rest of Asia, and bent its inhabitants to the yoke.

Here the impatience of Tommy, which had been encreasing a considerable time, could no longer be restrained, and he could not help interrupting the story, by addressing Mr. Barlow thus:

alt o very silve all as or a

Томму.

Sir, you will give me leave to ask you a question?

Mr. BARLOW.

As many as you choose.

Tommy.

In all these stories which I have heard, it feems as if those nations, that have little or nothing, are more good-natured, and better, and braver, than those that have a great deal.

Mr. BARLOW.

This is indeed sometimes the case.

Томму.

But then, why should it not be the case here, as well as in other places? Are all the poor in this country better than the rich?

It should seem, answered Mr. Barlow smiling, as you were of that opinion.

Yes, red YMMOT

Why fo, fir?

9 111

Mr. BARLOW.

Because, whatever you want to have done, I observe that you always address yourself to the poor, and not to the rich.

Tommy.

Yes, fir, but that is a different case. The poor are used to do many things which the rich never do.

Mr. BARLOW.

Are those things useful, or not useful?

TOMMY.

Why, to be fure, many of them are extremely useful; for, fince I have acquired fo much knowledge, I find they cultivate the ground to raife corn, and build houses, and hammer iron, which is so necessary to make every thing we use; besides feeding cattle, and dressing our victuals, and washing our cloaths, and, in short, doing every thing which is necessary to be done.

Mr. BARLOW.

What, do the poor do all these things?

Томму.

Yes, indeed, or else they never would be done. For it would be a very ungenteel thing to labour at a forge like a blacksmith, or hold the plough like a farmer, or build an house like a bricklayer.

Mr. BARLOW.

And did not you build an house in my garden some little time ago?

TOMMY.

Yes, fir, but that was only for my amusement. It was not intended for any body to live in.

Mr. BARLOW.

So you still think it the first qualification of a gentleman never to do any thing useful; and he that does any thing with that design ceases to be a gentleman.

Tommy looked a little ashamed at this,

Tommy looked a little ashamed at this, but he said it was not so much his own opinion, as that of the other young gentlemen and ladies with whom he had conversed.

But, replied Mr. Barlow, you asked just now which were the best, the rich or the poor; but if the poor provide food, and cloathing, and houses, and every thing esse, not only for themselves but for all the rich, while the rich do nothing at all, it must appear that the poor are better than the rich.

Томму.

Yes, fir, but then the poor do not act in that manner out of kindness, but because they are obliged to it.

Mr. BARLOW.

That indeed is a better argument than you fometimes use. But tell me which set of people would you preser, those that are always doing useful things because they are Vol. III. D obliged obliged to it, or those who never do any thing useful at all?

TOMMY.

Indeed, fir, I hardly know what to fay, but when I asked the question, I did not so much mean the doing useful things.—But now I think on it, the rich do a great deal of good by buying the things of the poor, and giving them money in return.

Mr. BARLOW.

What is money?

TOMMY.

Money, fir, money is—I believe little pieces of filver and gold, with an head upon them.

Mr. BARLOW.

And what is the use of these little pieces of silver and gold?

TOMMY.

Indeed I do not know that they are of any use. But every body has agreed to take them, and therefore you may buy with them whatever you want.

Mr.

SANDFORD AND MERTON.

Mr. BARLOW.

Then, according to your last account, the goodness of the rich consists in taking from the poor houses, cloaths, and food, and giving them in return little bits of filver and gold, which are really good for nothing. Томму.

Yes, fir; but then the poor can take these pieces of money and purchase every thing which they want.

Mr. BARLOW.

You mean, that, if a poor man has money in his pocket, he can always exchange it for cloaths, or food, or any other necessary. and thinks

Томму.

Indeed I do, fir.

Mr. BARLOW.

But who must he buy them of?—For, according to your account, the rich never produce any of these things; therefore, the poor, if they want to purchase them, can only do it of each other.

> D 2 TOM-

TOMMY.

But, fir, I cannot think that is always the case; for, I have been along with my mamma to shops, where there were fine powdered gentlemen and ladies that fold things to other people, and livery fervants, and young ladies that played upon the harpfichord like Miss Matilda.

Mr. BARLOW.

But, my good little friend, do you imagine that these fine powdered gentlemen and ladies made the things which they sold?

TOMMY.

That, sir, I cannot tell, but I should rather imagine not; for all the fine people I have ever seen are too much asraid of fpoiling their cloaths to work.

Mr. BARLOW.

All that they do, then, is to employ poorer persons to work for them, while they only sell what is produced by their labour. So that still you see we reach no farther than this; the rich do nothing and produce nothing, and the poor every thing that is really useful. Were there a whole nation of rich rich people, they would all be starved like the Spaniard in the story, because no one would condescend to produce any thing; and this would happen in spite of all their money, unless they had neighbours who were poorer to supply them. But a nation that was poor might be industrious, and gradually supply themselves with all they wanted; and then it would be of little confequence whether they had pieces of metal with heads upon them or not. But this conversation has lasted long enough at prefent, and, as you are now going to bed, I dare fay Miss Simmons will be so good as to defer the remainder of her story until tomorrow.

The next day Tommy rose before his father and mother, and, as his imagination had been forcibly acted on by the description he had heard of the Arabian horsemen, he defired his little horse might be saddled, and that William, his father's man, would attend him upon a ride. Unfortunately for Tommy, his vivacity was greater than his realon, and his talte for imitation was con-tinually leading him into some mischief or misfortune. He had no sooner been introduced into the acquaintance of genteel life, than he threw aside all his former habits, and burnt to diffinguish himself as a most accomplished young gentleman. He was now, in turn, sickened and disgusted with fashionable affectation, and his mind, at leifure for fresh impressions, was ready to catch at the first new object which occurred. The idea, therefore, which prefented itself to his mind, as foon as he opened his eyes, was that of being an Arabian horfeman. Nothing, he imagined, could equal the the pleasure of guiding a fiery steed over those immense and desolate wastes which he had heard described. In the mean time, as the country where he wished to exhibit was rather at too great a distance, he thought he might excite fome applause even upon the common before his father's house. Full of this idea, he rose, put on his boots, and fummoned William to attend William had been too much accuftomed to humour all his caprices, to make any difficulty of obeying him; and, as he had often ridden out with his young mafter before, he did not foresee the least possible inconvenience. But the maternal care of Mrs. Merton had made it an indispensable condition with her fon, that he should never prefume to ride with spurs, and she had strictly enjoined all the fervants never to fupply fupply him with those dangerous implements. Tommy had long murmured in fecret at this prohibition, which feemed to imply a distrust of his abilities in horseman-ship, which sensibly wounded his pride. But, fince he had taken it into his head to emulate the Arabs themselves, and perhaps excel them in their own art, he considered it as no longer possible to endure the dif-grace. But, as he was no stranger to the strict injunction which had been given to all the servants, he did not dare to make the experiment of foliciting their affiftance. While he was in this embarrassment, a new and fudden expedient presented itself to his fertile genius, which he inftantly resolved to adopt. Tommy went to his mamma's maid, and, without difficulty, obtained from her a couple of the biggest pins, which he thrust through the leather of his boots, and, thus accoutred, he mounted his horse without suspicion or observation. Tommy had not ridden far before he began to give vent to his reigning passion, and asked William if he had ever seen an Arabian on horseback. The answer of William sufficiently proved his ignorance, which Tommy kindly un-dertook to remove by giving him a detail of all the particulars he had heard the pre-D 4 ceding ceding night. But, unfortunately, the eloquence of Tommy precipitated him into a dangerous experiment; for, just as he was describing their rapid flight across the de-ferts, the interest of his subject so tranfported him, that he closed his legs upon his little horse, and pricked him in so senfible a manner, that the poney, who was not deficient in spirit, resented the attack, and fet off with him at a prodigious rate. William, when he faw his mafter thus burft forth, was at a loss whether to consider it as an accident, or only an oratorical grace; but, feeing the horse hurrying along the roughest part of the common, while Tommy tugged in vain to restrain his efforts, he thought it necessary to endeavour to overtake, and therefore purfued him with all the fpeed he could use. But the poney, whose blood seemed to be only the more enflamed by the violence of his own exertions, ran the faster when he heard the trampling of another horse behind him. In this manner did Tommy scamper over the common, while William purfued in vain; for, just as the fervant thought he had reached his mafter, his horse would push forward with such rapidity as left his purfuer far behind. Tommy kept his feat with infinite address, but

but he now began feriously to repent of his own ungovernable ambition, and would, with the greatest pleasure, have exchanged his own spirited steed for the dullest as in England. The race had now endured a considerable time, and seemed to be no nearer to a conclusion, when on a sudden, the poney turned short, upon an attempt of his mafter to stop him, and rushed precipitately into a large bog, or quagmire, which was full before him; here he made a momentary halt, and Tommy wifely embraced the opportunity of letting himfelf flide off upon a foft and yielding bed of mire. The fervant now came up to Tommy, and rescued him from his disagreeable fituation, where, however, he had received no other damage than that of daubing himself all over. William had been at first very much frightened at the danger of his mafter, but, when he faw that he had fo luckily escaped all hurt, he could not help asking him, with a smile, whether this too was a stroke of Arabian horseman-Tommy was a little provoked at this reflection upon his horsemanship, but, as he had now lost something of his irritability by repeated mortification, he wifely repressed his passion, and desired William to catch his horse, while he returned homewards on soot to warm himself. The servant, therefore, endeavoured to approach the poney, who, as if contented with the triumph he had obtained over his rider, was quietly seeding at a little distance; but, the instant William approached, he set off again at a violent rate, and seemed disposed to lead him a second chace not inserior to the first.

In the mean time, Tommy walked penfively along the common, reflecting upon the various accidents which had befallen him, and the repeated disappointments he had found in all his attempts to distinguish himfelf. While he was thus engaged, he overtook a poor and ragged figure, the fingularity of whose appearance engaged his attention. It was a man of middle age, in a dress he had never seen before, with two poor children that seemed with difficulty to keep up with him, while he carried a third in his arms, whose pale, emaciated looks, sufficiently declared disease and pain. The man had upon his head a coarse blue bonnet instead of an hat; he was wrapped round by a tattered kind of garment, striped with various colours, and, at his fide, hung down a long and formidable fword. furveyed furveyed him with fuch an earnest observation, that, at length, the man took notice of it, and, bowing to him with the greatest civility, ventured to ask him if he had met with any accident, that he appeared in a diforder which fuited so little with his quality. Tommy was not a little pleased with the discernment of the man, that could distinguish his importance in spite of the dirtiness of his cloaths, and therefore mildly anfwered; No, friend, there is not much the matter.-I have a little obstinate horse that ran away with me, and, after trying in vain to throw me down, he plunged into the middle of that great bog there, and fo I jumped off for fear of being swallowed up, otherwise I should soon have made him fubmit; for I am used to such things, and don't mind them in the least. Here the child that the man was carrying began to cry bitterly, and the father endeavoured to pacify him, but in vain. Poor thing, faid Tommy, he feems not to be well-I am heartily forry for him .- Alas! mafter anfwered the man, he is not well, indeed; he has now a violent ague fit upon him, and I have not had a morfel of bread to give him, or any of the reft, fince yesterday noon.

Tommy was naturally generous, and now

his mind was unufually foftened by the remembrance of his own recent distresses; he therefore pulled a shilling our of his pocket and gave it to the man, saying, Here, my honest friend, here is something to buy your ehild fome food, and I fincerely wish he may foon recover. God blefs your fweet face! said the man; you are the best friend I have feen this many a day; but for this kind affiftance we might have all been loft. He then, with many bows and thanks, struck across the common into a different path; and Tommy went forward, feeling a greater pleasure at this little act of humanity than he had long been acquainted with among all the fine acquaintance he had late-ly contracted. But he had walked a very little way with these reslections, before he met with a new adventure; a flock of sheep was running with all the precipitation which fear could inspire from the pursuit of a large dog, and just as Tommy approached, the dog had overtaken a lamb, and feemed difposed to devour it. Tommy was naturally an enemy to all cruelty, and therefore running towards the dog, with more alacrity than prudence, he endeavoured to drive him from his prey. But the animal, who pro-bably despited the diminutive size of his adversary, adversary, after growling a little while and showing his teeth, when he found that this was not fufficient to deter him from intermeddling, intirely quitted the sheep; and, making a fudden spring, seized upon the skirt of Tommy's coat, which he shook with every expression of rage. Tommy behaved with more intrepidity than could have been expected, for he neither cried out nor attempted to run, but made his utmost efforts to disengage himself from his enemy. But as the contest was so unequal, it is probable he would have been severely bitten, had not the honest stranger, whom he had relieved, come running up to his affistance, and seeing the danger of his benefactor, laid the dog dead at his feet by a furious stroke of his broad-sword. Tommy, thus delivered from the impending danger, expressed his gratitude to the stranger in the most affectionate manner, and defired him to accompany him to his father's house; where he and his wearied children should receive whatever refreshment they wished. He then turned his eyes to the lamb, which had been the cause of the contest, and lay panting upon the ground, bleeding and wounded, but not to death, and remarked, with aftonishment, upon his fleece, the well-known characters of H. S. accompanied with a cross! As I live, faid Tommy, I believe this is the very lamb which Harry used to be so fond of, and which used sometimes to follow him to Mr. Barlow's. I am the luckiest fellow in the world to have come in time to deliver him; and now, perhaps, Harry may forgive me all the ill usage he has met with. Saying this, he took the lamb up, and kissed it with the greatest tenderness; nay, he would have even borne it home in his arms had it not been rather too heavy for his strength: but the honest stranger, with a grateful officioufness, offered his fervices, and prevailed on Tommy to let him carry it, while he delivered his child to the biggest of its brothers.

When Tommy was now arrived within a little distance of his home, he met his father and Mr. Barlow, who had left the house to enjoy the morning air before breakfast. They were surprized to see him in such an equipage; for the dirt, which had bespattered him from head to foot, began to dry in various places, and gave him the appearance of a farmer's clay-built wall in the act of hardening. But Tommy, without giving them time to make inquiries, ran affectionately up to Mr. Barlow, and taking him by the hand, said; Oh, sir! here is the luckiest accident in the world-poor Harry Sandford's favourite lamb would have been killed by a great mischievous dog, if I had not happened to come by and fave his life. And who is this honest man, faid Mr. Merton, whom you have picked up upon the common? He feems to be in diffress, and his famished children are scarcely able to drag themselves along. Poor man, answered Tommy, I am very much obliged to him; for, when I went to save Harry's lamb, the dog attacked me and would have hurt me very much, if he had not come to my affiftance, and killed him with his great sword. So I have brought him with me that he might refresh himself with his poor children, one of which has a terrible ague. For I knew, papa, though I have not behaved well of late, you would not be against my doing an act of charity. I am, on the contrary, very glad, said Mr. Merton, to fee you have fo much gratitude in your temper. But what is the reason that I fee you thus disfigured with dirt? Surely you must have been riding, and your horse have thrown you. And so it is, for here is William following with both the horses in s foam. William at that moment appeared. ed, and, trotting up to his master, began to make excuses for his own share in the bufiness. Indeed, sir, said he, I did not think there was the least harm in going out with master Tommy; and we were riding along as quietly as possible, and master was giving me a long account of the Arabs; who, he faid, lived in the finest country in the world, which does not produce any thing to eat, or drink, or wear; and yet they never want or come upon the parish; but ride the most mettled horses in the world, fit to fart for any plate in England. And just as he was giving me this account, Punch took it into his head to run away, and while I was endeavouring to catch him, he jumped into a quagmire, and shot master Tommy off in the middle of it. No, said Tommy, there you mistake; I believe I could manage a much more spirited horse than Punch; but I thought it prudent to throw myself off, for fear of his plunging deeper in the mire. But how is this, said Mr. Merton? The poney used to be the quietest of horses; what can have given him this sudden impulse to run away? Sure, William, you were not so imprudent as to trust your master with spurs. No, fir, answered William, not I, and I can take take my oath he had no spurs on when we fer out. Mr. Merton was convinced there was fome mystery in this transaction, and looking at his fon to find it out, he, at length, discovered the ingenious contrivance of Tommy to supply the place of spurs, and could hardly preserve his gravity at the sight. He, however, mildly fet before him his imprudence, which might have been attended with the most fatal confequences, the fracture of his limbs, or even the loss of his life, and defired him for the future to be more cautious. They then returned to the house, and Mr. Merton ordered the fervants to fupply his guests with plenty of the most nourishing food. After breakfast, they sent for the unhappy stranger into the parlour, whose countenance now bespoke his satisfaction and gratitude; and Mr. Merton, who by his dress and accent discovered him to be an inhabitant of Scotland, defired to know by what accident he had thus wandered so far from home with these poor helples children, and had been reduced to fo much mifery. Alas! yourhonour, answered the man, I should ill deferve the favours you have shewn me, if I attempted to conceal any thing from fuch worthy benefactors. My tale, however, is fimple fimple and uninteresting, and I fear there can be nothing in the story of my distress the least deserving of your attention. Surely, said Mr. Merton, with the most benevolent courtefy, there must be something in the distress of every honest man which ought to interest his fellow-creatures: and if you will acquaint us with all the circumstances of your situation, it may perhaps be within our power, as it certainly is in our inclinations, to do you farther fervice. The man then bowed to the company with an air of dignity which furprized them all, and thus began :- I was born in that part of our island which is called the North of Scotland. The country there, partly from the barrenness of the soil and the inclemency of the feafons, and partly from other causes which I will not now enumerate, is unfavourable to the existence of its inhabitants. More than half the year our mountains are covered with continual fnows, which prohibit the use of agriculture, or blast the expectations of an harvest. Yet the race of men which inhabit these dreary wilds, are perhaps not more undeferving the smiles of fortune than many of their happier neighbours. Accustomed to a life of toil and hardship, their bodies are braced by the incessant difficulties they have to encounter, and their minds remain untainted by the example of their more luxurious neighbours. They are bred up from infancy with a deference and respect for their parents, and with a mutual spirit of endearment towards their equals, which I have not remarked in happier climates. These circumstances expand and elevate the mind, and attach the highlanders to their native mountains with a warmth of affection, which is fcarcely known in the midst of polished cities and cultivated countries. Every man there is more or less acquainted with the history of his clan, and the martial exploits which they have performed. In the winter feafon we fit around the blazing light of our fires, and commemorate the glorious actions of our ancestors; the children catch the found, and confider themselves as interested in supporting the honour of a nation, which is yet unfullied in the annals of the world, and resolve to transmit it equally pure to their posterity. With these impressions, which were the earliest I can remember, you cannot wonder, gentlemen, that I should early imbibe a spirit of enterprize and a love of arms. My father was, indeed, poor, but he

he had been himfelf a foldier, and therefore did not so strenuously oppose my growing inclinations. He, indeed, set before me the little chance I should have of promotion, and the innumerable difficulties of my, intended profession. But what were difficulties to a youth brought up to subsit upon a handful of oatmeal, to drink the waters of the stream, and to sleep, shrouded in my plaid, beneath the arch of an impending rock! I fee, gentlemen, continued the highlander, that you appear furprized to hear a man, who has so little to recommend him, express himself in rather loftier language than you are accustomed to among your peasantry here. But you should remember that a certain degree of education is more general in Scotland than where you live; and that, wanting almost all the gifts of fortune, we cannot afford to fuffer those of nature to remain uncultivated. When, therefore, my father faw that the determined bent of my temper was towards a military life, he thought in vain to oppose my inclinations. He even, perhaps, involuntarily cherished them, by explaining to me, during the long leifure of our dreary winter, some books which treated of military sciences and ancient history. From thefe these I imbibed an early love of truth and honour, which I hope has not abandoned me fince; and, by teaching me what brave and virtuous men have fuffered in every age and country, they have, perhaps, prevented me from entirely finking under my misfortunes.

One night in the autumn of the year, as we were feated round the embers of our fire, we were reated round the embers of our fire, we heard a knocking at the door. My father rose, and a man of a majestic presence came in and requested permission to pass the night in our cottage. He told us he was an English officer who had long been stationed in the highlands; but now, upon the breaking out of war, he had been sent for in haste to London, whence he was to comball for America as soon as he was to embark for America as foon as he could be joined by his regiment. This, find he, has been the reason of my travelling later than prudence permits in a mountainous country with which I am imperfectly acquainted. I have unfortunately loft my way, and, but for your kindness, added he smiling, I must here begin my campaign. and pass the night upon a bed of heath amid the mountains. My father rose and received the officer with all the courtesy he was able; for in Scotland every man thinks thinks himself honoured by being permitted to exercise his hospitality; he told him his accommodations were mean and poor, but what he had was heartily at his fervice. He then fent me to look after his visitor's horse, and set before him some milk and oaten bread, which were all the dainties we possession were as the possession proved that he could be no stranger to a more delicate way of living, not a single word fell from him that intimated he had ever been used to better fare. During the evening he entertained us with various accounts of the dangers he had already efcaped, and the fervice he had feen. He particularly described the manners of the favage tribes he was going to encounter in America, and the nature of their warfare. All this, accompanied with the tone and look of a man that was familiar with great events, and had borne a confiderable share in all he related, so enflamed my military ardour, that I was no longer capable of re-pressing it. The stranger perceived it, and, looking at me with an air of tenderness and comcompassion, asked if that young man was intended for the service. My colour rose, and my heart immediately swelled at the question; the look and manner of our guest had strangely interested me in his savour, and the natural grace and simplicity with which he related his own exploits put me in mind of the great men of other times. Could I but march under the banners of fuch a leader, I thought nothing would be too arduous to be atchieved. I faw a long perspective before me of com-bats, difficulties, and dangers; something, however, whispered to my mind that I should be successful in the end, and support the reputation of our name and clan. Full of these ideas, I sprang forwards at the question, and told the officer that the darling passion of my life would be to bear arms under a chief like him; and that, if he would fuffer me to enlist under his command, I should be ready to justify his kind-ness by patiently supporting every hardship, and facing every danger. Young man, re-plied he, with a look of kind concern, there is not an officer in the army that would not be proud of such a recruit; but I should ill repay the hospitality I have received from your parents, if I suffered you to be deceived in your opinion of the military profession. He then set before me, in the strongest language, all the hardships which would be my lot; the dangers of the field, the peflilence of camps, the flow confuming languor of hospitals, the infolence of command, the mortification of subordination, and the uncertainty that the exertions of even a long life would ever lead to the least promotion. All this, replied I, trembling with fear that my father should take advantage of these too just representations to refuse his consent, I knew before; but I feel an irrefistible impulse within me which compels me to the field. The die is cast for life or death, and I will abide by the chance that now occurs. If you, fir, refuse me, I will however enlist with the first officer that will accept me; for I will no longer wear out life amid the folitude of these surrounding mountains, without even a chance of meriting applause or distinguishing my name.

The officer then defifted from his oppofition, and, turning to my parents, asked them if it were with their consent that I was going to enlist. My mother burst into tears, and my fisters hung about me weeping; my father replied, with a deep figh, I have long experienced that it is vain to oppose the decrees of Providence. Could my persuasions have availed, he would have remained contented in these mountains; but that is now impossible, at least till he has purchased wisdom at the price of his blood. If, therefore, fir, you do not despise his youth and mien, take him with you, and let him have the advantage of your example. I have been a soldier myfelf, and I can assure you, with truth, that I have never seen an officer under whom I I have never feen an officer under whom I would more gladly march than yourself. Our guest made a polite reply to my father, and instantly agreed to receive me. He then pulled out a purse, and, offering it to my father, said, the common price of a recruit is now five guineas, but, so well am I satisfied with the appearance of your son, and the considence you repose in me, that I must insist upon your accepting what is contained in this purse; you will dispose of it as you please for your mutual advantage. Before I depart to-morrow, I will give such directions as may enable him to join the regiment, which is now preparing to the regiment, which is now preparing to march. He then requested that he might retire to rest, and my father would have refigned the only bed he had in the house to Vol. III.

his guest; but he absolutely refused, and faid, Would you shame me in the eyes of my new recruit? What is a soldier good for that cannot sleep without a bed? The time will foon arrive when I shall think a comfortable roof and a little straw, an enviable luxury. I, therefore, raifed him as convenient a couch as I was able to make with heath and straw; and, wrapping himself up in his riding coat, he threw himself down upon it, and slept till morning. With the first dawn of day he rose and departed, having first given me the directions which were necessary to enable me to join the regiment: but, before he went, my father, who was equally charmed with his generofity and manners, pressed him to take back part of the money he had given us; this, however, he absolutely refused, and left us full of efteem and admiration.

I will not, gentlemen, repeat the affecting feene I had to undergo in taking leave of my family and friends. It pierced me to the very heart; and then, for the first time, I almost repented at being so near the accomplishment of my wishes. I was, however, engaged, and determined to fulfil my engagement; I, therefore, tore myself from my family, having, with difficulty, prevailed vailed upon my father to accept of part of the money I had received for my enrolment. I will not trespass upon your time to describe the various emotions which I selt at the crowd of new sensations, which entered my mind along our march. I arrived without an accident at London, the splendid capital of this kingdom; but I could not there restrain my astonishment, to see an immense people talking of wounds, of death, of battles, sieges, and conquests, in the midst of seasts, and balls, and puppetshows; and calmly devoting thousands of their sellow-creatures to perish by samine or the sword, while they considered the loss of a dinner, or the endurance of a shower, as an exertion too great for human fortitude.

I foon embarked, and arrived, without any other accident than an horrible fickness, at the place of our destination in America. Here I joined my gallant officer, colonel Simmons, who had performed the voyage in another ship.—Mis Simmons, who was present at this narration, seemed to be much interested at this mention of her own name; she, however, did not express her feelings, and the stranger proceeded with his story.—This gentleman was, with justice, the most beloved, and the most deserving to be so,

of any officer I have ever known. Inflexible in every thing that concerned the honour of the service, he never pardoned wilful misbehaviour, because he knew that it was incompatible with military discipline; yet, when obliged to punish, he did it with fuch reluctance, that he seemed to suffer almost as much as the criminal. But, if his reason imposed this just and necessary feverity, his heart had taught him another lesson in respect to the private distresses of his men. He visited them in their sicknesses, relieved their miseries, and was a niggard of nothing but human blood ;--but I ought to correct myfelf in that expression, for he was rashly lavish of his own, and to that we owe his untimely lofs.

I had not been long in America before the colonel, who was perfectly acquainted with the language and manners of the favage tribes that border upon the British colonies, was fent upon an embassy to one of their nations, for the purpose of foliciting their alliance with Britain. It may, perhaps, be not uninteresting to you, gentlemen, and to this my honourable little master, to hear some account of a people whose manners and customs are so much the reverse of what you see at home. As my worthy officer, therefore, contented with my affiduity and improvement in military knowledge, permitted me to have the honour of attending him, I will describe some of the most curious facts which I was witness to.

You have, doubtless, heard many accounts of the furprizing increase of the English colonies in America; and, when we reflect that it is scarcely an hundred years fince some of them were established, it must be confessed that they have made rapid improvements in clearing the ground of mprovements in clearing the ground of woods and bringing it to cultivation. Yet, much as they have already done, the country is yet an immense forest, except immediately upon the coasts. These forests extend on every side to a distance that no human sagacity or observation has been able to determine. They abound in every species of tree which you see in England, to which may be added a great various more which may be added a great variety more which are unknown with us. Under their shade is generally found a rich luxurious herbage, which ferves for pasture to a thou-fand herds of animals. Here are seen elks, a kind of deer of the largest size, and buffaloes, a frecies of wild ox, by thousands, and even horses, which, having been originally E 3 ginally brought over by the Spaniards have escaped from their settlements and multiplied in the woods.

Dear, faid Tommy, that must be a fine country, indeed, where horses run wild: why a man might have one for nothing. And yet, faid Mr. Merton, it would be but of little use for a person to have a wild horse, who is not able to manage a tame one.

Tommy made no answer to his father, and the man proceeded :- But the greatest curiofity of all this country is, in my opinion, the various tribes or nations which inhabit it. Bred up from their infancy to a life of equal hardiness with the wild animals, they are almost as robust in their consti-tutions. These various tribes inhabit little villages which generally are feated upon the banks of rivers, and, though they cultivate fmall portions of land around their towns, they feek the greater part of their fubfiftence from the chace. In their persons they are rather tall and slender, but admi-rably well proportioned and active, and their colour is a pale red, exactly refembling copper. Thus accustomed to roam about the woods, and brave the inclemencies of the weather, as well as continually exposed to the attacks of their enemies, they acquire a degree of courage and fortitude which can fearcely be conceived. It is nothing to them to pass whole days without a morsel of food, to lie whole nights upon the bare damp ground, and to swim the widest rivers in the depth of winter. Money, indeed, and the greater part of what we call the conveniences of life, they are unacquainted with; nor can they conceive that one man should ferve another merely because he has a few pieces of shining metal; they imagine that the only just distinctions arise from superior courage and bodily perfections, and therefore these alone are able to engage their esteem. I shall never forget the contempt which one of their chiefs expressed at seeing an officer who was rather corpulent at the head of his men: What fools, said he, are these Europeans, to be commanded by a man who is fo unwieldy that he can neither annoy his enemies nor defend his friends, and who is only fit to be a scullion! When they are at peace, they exercise the virtue of hospitality to a degree that might shame more polished nations: if a ttranger arrives at any of their towns, he enters into the first habitation he pleases, and is sure to be entertained with E 4

all the family possess. In this manner he might journey from one end of the continent to the other, and never fail a friendly reception.

But, if their manners are gentle in peace, they are more dreadful when provoked than ail the wildest animals of the forest. Bred up from infancy to fuffer no restraint, and to give an unbounded loefe to all their paffions, they know not what it is to forgive an injury. They love their tribe with a degree of affection that is totally unknown in every other country; for that they are ready to fuffer every hardship and danger; wounds, and pain, and death, they despise, as often as the interest of their country is concerned; but the same attachment renders them implacable and unforgiving to all their enemies: in short, they seem to have all the virtues and the vices of the ancient Spartans.

To one of these tribes, called the Ottigamies, was Colonel Simmons fent ambaflador, accompanied by a few more officers, and fome private men, among whom I had the honour to be included. We purfued our march, for several days, through forests which feemed to be of equal duration with the world itself. Sometimes we were shrouded in such obsurity from the thickness of the covert, that we could scarcely see the light of Heaven; sometimes we emerged into spacious meadows, bare of trees, and covered with the most luxuriant herbage, on which were feeding immense herds of buffaloes: these, as soon as they shuffed the approach of men, which they are capable of doing even at a considerable distance, ran with precipitation into the surrounding woods. Many, however, fell beneath our attack, and served us for sood during our journey. At length, we came to a wide and rapid river, upon whose banks we found a party of friendly savages, with some of whom we embarked upon canoes made of the bark of trees, to proceed to the country of the Ottigamies.

After three days inceffant rowing, we entered a spacious lake, upon whose banks were encamped a considerable part of the nation we sought. As we approached the shore, they saluted us with a volley of balls from their muskets, which whistled just above our heads without producing mischief. I and several of the soldiers instantly seized our arms, imagining it to be an hostile attack; but our leader quieted our apprehensions by informing us that this was only a friendly falute with which a nation of warriors received and welcomed their allies. We landed, and were instantly conducted to the affembly of the chiefs, who were fitting upon the ground, without external pomp or ceremony, with their arms beside them; but there was in their countenances and eyes an expression of ferocious grandeur which would have daunted the boldest European. Yes, gentlemen, I have feen the greatest and most powerful men in my own country; I have seen them adorned with every external circumstance of dress, and pomp, and equipage, to inspire respect; but never did I see any thing which so completely awed the foul as the angry fcowl and fiery glance of a savage American.

As foon as our leader entered the circle, he produced the calumet or pipe of peace. This is the universal mark of friendship and alliance among all the barbarous nations of America; and he that bears it, is considered with so much respect, that his person is always safe. This calumet is nothing but a long and slender pipe, ornamented with the most lively and beautiful feathers, which are ingeniously fixed along the tube. The bole is composed of a peculiar kind of reddish marble, and filled with with fcented herbs and tobacco. Colonel Simmons lighted his pipe with great fo-leinnity, and turning the bole first towards the heavens, then to the earth, then in a circle round him, he began to finoke. In the mean time the whole affembly fat with mute attention, waiting to hear his propotals: for, though we call them favages, yet in some respects, they well deserve to be imitated by more refined nations. In all their meetings and assemblies, the greatest order and regularity prevail; whoever rifes to speak, is sure of being patiently heard to the end without the least interruption. Our leader then began to harangue them in their own language, with which he was well acquainted. I did not understand what past, but it was afterwards explained to me, that he fet besore their eyes the injuries they had mutually received from the French and the tribes in their alliance. He told them that their great father, for so these: people call the king of Britain, had taken up the hatchet of war, and was fending and innumerable band of warriors to punish the infults of his enemies. He told them that : he had ordered him to visit the Ottigamies, his dutiful children, and smoke with them the pipe of peace. He invited their young E 6 men !

men to join the warriors that came from beyond the ocean, and who were marching to bury the bones of their brethren, who had been killed by their mutual foes. When he had concluded, he flung upon the ground a curious string of shells which is called the belt of Wampum. This is a necessary circumstance in all the treaties made with these tribes. Whoever comes as an ambaffador brings one with him to prefent to the people whose friendship is solicited, and if the belt is accepted, the proposed alliance is confidered as entered into. As foon as our leader had finished, a chief of a stature fuperior to the common race of men, and of a most determined look, jumped into the middle of the affembly, and, taking up the belt, cried out in their language: Let us march, my brethren, with the young men of our great father. Let us dig up the hatchet of war, and revenge the bones of our countrymen. They lie unburied, and cry to us for vengeance. We will not be deaf to their cries; we will shake off all delays; we will approve ourselves worthy of our ancestors. We will drink the blood of our enemies, and spread a feast of carnage for the fowls of the air and the wild - French Cart beafts of the forest. This resolution was univerfally approved by the whole nation, who consented to the war with a ferocious joy. The affembly was then diffolved, and the chiefs prepared for their intended march according to the manners of their country. All the favage tribes that inhabit America are accustomed to very little cloathing. Inured to the inclemencies of the weather, and being in the constant exercise of all their limbs, they cannot bear the restraint and confinement of an European dress. The greater part of their bodies, therefore, is naked, and this they paint in various fashions to give additional terror to their looks. When the chiefs were thus prepared, they came from their tents, and the last solemnity I was witness to was dancing the dance of war, and finging the fong of death. But what words can convey an adequate idea of the furious movements and expressions which animated them through the whole of this performance? Every man was armed with a kind of hatchet, which is their usual weapon in battle, and called a tomahawk. This he held in his hand, and brandished through the whole of the dreadful spectacle. As they went on, their faces kindled into an expreffion pression of anger which would have daunted the boldest spectator. Their gestures seem-ed to be inspired by frantic rage and im-placable animosity. They moved their bodies with the most violent agitations, and it was easy to see they represented all the circumstances of a real combat. They seemed to be engaged in close or distant battle, and brandshed their weapons with so much fury, that you would have imagined they were going every instant to hew each other to pieces; nor would it have been possible, even for the performers themselves of this terrific dance, to have avoided mutual? wounds and flaughter, had they not been. endued with that extraordinary activity, which is peculiar to favage nations. By intervals they increased the horid folemnity of the exhibition, by uttering yells that would have pierced an European ear with horror. I have feen rage and fury under the property forms, and in different parts of the various forms, and in different parts of the globe, but I must confess, that every thing I have seen elsewhere is feeble and contemptible when compared with this day's spectacle. When the whole was finished, they entertained us at a public sessival in their cabins, and when we departed, dismiss us with these expressive wishes; they prayed that the Great Spirit would favour us with a prosperous voyage; that he would give us an unclouded sky and smooth waters by day, and that we might lie down at night on a beaver blanket, enjoying uninterrupted sleep and pleasant dreams; and that we might find continual protection under the great pipe of peace.—I have been thus particular, said the highlander, in describing the circumstances of this embassy, because you have not distained to hear the story of my adventures; and I thought that this description of a people so totally unlike all you have been accustomed to in Europe might not prove entirely uninteresting.

We are much obliged to you, faid Mr. Barlow, for all these curious particulars, which are perfectly conformable to all I have heard and read upon the subject. Nor can I consider, without a certain degree of admiration, the savage grandeur of man in his most simple state. The passion for revenge, which marks the character of all uncivilized nations, is certainly to be condemned. But it is one of the constant prejudices of their education, and many of those that call themselves refined, have more to blush at, in that respect, than they are aware of. Few, I am asraid, even in the most refined state of society, have arrived at that sublime generosity, which is able to forgive the injuries of its sellow-creatures, when it has the power to repay them; and I see many around me, that are disgraced by the vices of uncivilized Americans, without a claim to their virtues.

I will not fatigue your ears, continued the highlander, with a recital of all the events I was engaged in, during the progress of the war. The description of blood and carnage is always disagreeable to a humane mind; and though the perversity of mankind may sometimes render war a necessary evil, the remembrance of its mischiefs is always painful. I will only mention one event, continually lamented in the annals of this country, because it is connected with the untimely fate of my noble friend and gallant leader.

It was determined by those who governed, that we should march through the woods upon a distant expedition against the French. The conduct of this enterprize was given to a brave but rash commander, totally unacquainted with the people he had to oppose, and unskilled in the nature of a savage war. We therefore began our march through the same tractless wilds I have defcribed. We proceeded for several days, without any other difficulties than the nature of the country itself produced, and without feeing the face of an enemy. It was in vain that officers of the greatest ex-. perience, and particularly my worthy colonel, fuggefted to our commander the necessity of using every precaution against a dangerous and insidious foe. War is not managed, amid the forests of America, in the fame manner as it is conducted upon the plains of Europe. The temper of the people there conspires with the nature of the country, to render it a continual scene of stratagems and surprize. Unincumbered with tents, or baggage, or numerous trains of artillery, the hostile warriors set out in small and chosen parties, with nothing but their arms, and are continually upon the watch to deceive their enemies. Long experience has taught them a degree of fagacity in traverfing the woods, which to us is inconceivable. Neither the widest rivers, nor the most extensive forests, can retard them for an instant. A march of al thousand miles is scarcely to them a greater: difficulty than the passage of an European army army between two neighbouring towns. The woods themselves afford them a continual supply of provisions, in the various animals which they kill by the chace. When they are near their enemies, they frequently lurk all day in thickets, for fear of a discovery, and pursue their march by night. Hundreds of them fometimes purfue their course in the same line, treading only in each other's steps, and the last of the party carefully covers over the impref-fions which his fellows have made. When they are thus upon the point of accomplishing their purpose, the very necessities of nature are unheeded: they cease to fire upon the beasts of the forest, lest it should alarm the foe; they feed upon roots or the bark of trees, or pass successive days in a perfect abstinence from food. All this our colonel represented to the general, and conjured him, with the strongest entreaties, not to hazard the fafety of our army by an incautious progress. He advised him to send out numerous detachments to beat the bushes and examine the woods; and offered himself to secure the march of the army. But presumption is always blind: our general was unacquainted with any other than European European warfare, and could not conceive that naked favages would dare to attack an army of two thousand disciplined troops. One morning the way before us appeared more intricate and obscure than common; the forests did not as usual consist of lofty trees, which afford a tolerably clear prospect between their trunks, but were composed of creeping bushes and impervious thickets. The army marched as usual with the vain oftentation of military discipline, but totally unprepared for the dreadful scene which followed. At length we entered a gloomy valley, furrounded on every fide by the thickest shade, and rendered swampy by the overflowings of a little rivulet. In this situation it was impossible to continue our march without difordering our ranks; and part of the army extended itself beyond the rest, while another part of the line involuntarily fell behind. In the moment while the officers were employed in rectifying the diforder of their men, a sudden noise of musquetry was heard in front, which stretched about twenty of our men upon the field. The foldiers instinctively fired towards the part whence they were attacked, and instantly fell back in disorder. But it was equally vain to retreat or go forward, for it now appeared that we were completely hemmed in. On every fide refounded the fatal peals of feattering fire, that thinned our ranks and extended our braveft comrades on the earth. Figure to yourself a shoal of sishes enclosed within the net, that circle in vain the fatal labyrinth in which they are involved; or rather conceive, what I have myfelf been witness to, an herd of eleer furrounded on every fide by a band of active and unpitying hunters, that prefs and gall them on every fide, and exterminate them at leifure in their flight. Just fuch was the fituation of our unfortunate countrymen. After a few unavailing discharges which nevel annoyed a secret enemy that scattered death unfeen, the ranks were broken, and all fubordination lost. The ground was covered with gasping wretches, and stained with blood; the woods resounded with tries? and groans, and fruitless attempts of our gallant officers to rally their men and check the progress of the enemy. By intervals was heard, more shrill, more dreadful than all the reft, the difinal yell of the victorious favages, that now, emboldened by their fuccess, began to leave the covert, and hew down those who fled, with unrelenting cruelty. As to myself, the description which our colonel had given me of their method of attack, and the precautions to be used against it, rendered me perhaps less disturbed than I should otherwise have been. I remarked that those who stood and those who fled were exposed to equal danger; those who kept their rank, and endeavoured to repel the enemy, exposed their persons to their fire and were fuccessively shot down, as happened to most of our unfortunate officers; while those who fled frequently rushed headlong upon the very death they fought to avoid. Pierced to the heart at the fight of fuch a carnage of my gallant comrades, I grew indifferent to life and abandoned myfelf to despair; but it was a despair that neither impaired my exertions nor robbed me of the faculties of my mind. Imitate me, I cried, my gallant countrymen, and we shall yet be safe, I then directly ran to the nearest tree, and sheltered myself behind its stem; convinced that this precaution alone could fecure me from the incessant vollies which darted on every side. A fmall number of highlanders followed my example, and, thus secured, we began to fire with more fuccess at the enemy, who now exposed themselves with less referve. This check feemed to aftonish and confound them:

them; and had not the panic been so general, it is possible that this successful effort might have changed the fortune of the fight; for in another quarter the provincial troops that accompanied us behaved with the greatest bravery, and, though deserted by the European forces, effected their own retreat. But it was now too late to hope for victory or even fafety; the ranks were broken on every fide, the greater part of our officers flain or wounded, and our unfortunate general himself had expiated with his life, his fatal rashness. I cast my eyes around, and faw nothing but images of death, and horror, and frantic rage. even then the fafety of my noble colonel was dearer to me than my own. I fought him for fome time in vain, amid the various scenes of carnage which surrounded me. At length, I discovered him at a distance, almost deserted by his men, yet still attempting to renew the fight, and heedless of the wounds which covered him. Transported with grief and passion, I immediately darted forward to offer him my feeble support; but in the very instant of my arrival, he received a straggling ball in his bosom, and tottering to a tree, supported his fainting limbs against the trunk. Just in that moment, three three of our favage enemies observed his situation and marked him for their prey; they raised their hideous yell, and darted upon him with the speed and fierceness of wolves. Fury then took possession of my soul; had I possessed a thousand lives I should have held them cheap in the balance:-I fired with fo unerring an aim that I stretched the foremost on the earth; the second received the point of my bayonet in his breast, and fell in the pangs of death; the third, daunted with the fate of his companions, turned his steps another way. Just then an horse that had lost his rider was galloping along the wood; I bounded across the path, and, feizing him by the bridle, instantly led him to my leader, and conjur-ed him to preserve his glorious life. He thanked me in the most affectionate manner for my friendship, but bade me preserve my own life. As to myfelf, faid he, I do not wish to survive my country's dishonour, and even had I fuch a wish, the wounds I have received would render all escape impossible. If that is your resolution, said I, we will die together, for I swear by the eternal majesty of my Creator, that I will not leave you. When he faw me thus refolved, he confented to use my affiftance, and with infinite finite difficulty I feated him upon the horse, which, holding by the reins, as I was then light and active, I guided along the wood with no inconsiderable speed. Fortunately for me we were not observed by any of our savage enemies; so that slying through the thickest part of the forest, we left the danger behind, and were foon removed beyond the fight or hearing of the battle. Courage, faid I, my noble leader, you are now almost in safety; and I trust you will yet preserve a life so necessary to your friends and coun-try. He answered me with the kindest expressions, but with a feeble voice: Campbell, I have confented to fly more for the take of preserving your life, than from any hopes of my own. But fince we are at a distance from yonder dreadful scene, permit me to alight; I have consumed my small remaining forces in the way, and now I faint from loss of blood. He sunk down at this, and would have fallen, but I received him in my arms; I bore him to the . next thicket, and strewing grass and leaves upon the ground, endeavoured to prepare him a bed. He thanked me again with gratitude and tenderness, and grasped my hand as he lay in the very agonies of death; for such it was, although I believed he had only only fainted, and long tried every ineffectual method to restore departed life. Thus was I deprived of the noblest officer and kindest friend that ever deserved the attachment of a foldier; twenty years have now rolled over me fince that inauspicious day; yet it lives for ever in my remembrance, and never shall be blotted from my soul. The highlander then turned away to hide a tear which did not misbecome his manly countenance; the company feemed all to share his griefs, but Miss Simmons above the rest; however, as the natural gentleness of her temper was sufficiently known, no one suspected that she had any particular interest in the relation.

I fat till night, continued the stranger, supporting the breathless body of my colonel, and vainly hoping he might return to life. At length I perceived that his noble soul was sted for ever; my own wounds grew stiff and painful, and exhausted nature required a supply of food. I therefore arose, and finding a spring that trickled down an hill at no great distance, I refreshed myself by a copious draught, and washed the clotted blood away from the hurs. I had received ted blood away from the hurts I had received. I then crushed some leaves, which the inhabitants of that country imagine falutary, Vol. III. and and bound them on with bandages I tore from my linen. I also found a few wild fruits, which past experience had taught me were innocent, with which I allayed the pains of hunger. I then returned to the thicket, and, creeping into the thickest part, endeavoured to compose myself to rest. Strange, gentlemen, as it may appear, nei-ther the forlorn nature of my fituation, nor the dangers with which I was befet, were fufficient to keep me awake. My wearied and exhausted body seemed to triumph over all the agitations of my mind; and I sunk into a fleep as deep and profound as that of death itself. I awoke next morning, with the first rays of the fun; but, more composed, I better understood the difficul-ties in which I was involved, and the uncertainty of my escape. I was in the midst of an immense desert, totally destitute of human affistance or support. Should I meet with any of my fellow-creatures, I could expect nothing but implacable cruelty; and even if I escaped their vigilance, what method of finding subsistence, or of measuring back without a guide the long and tedious march I had trodden? Hope, however, and the vigour of my constitution, still supported me. I reflected, that it is the common mon lot of man to struggle with misfortunes; that it is cowardice to yield to evils, when present, the representation of which had not deterred me from voluntarily embracing the profession of a soldier; and that the providence of Heaven was as capable of protecting me in the forests of America, as upon my native mountains. I therefore determined to struggle with the difficulties which furrounded me to the last, and to meet my fortune like a man. Yet, as I still by intervals heard the dismal cries of the enemy, and faw their fires at a distance, I lay close till night in the obscurity of my thicket. When all was dark and still, I ventured abroad, and laid in my scanty provision of fruits and herbs, and drank again at the spring. The pain of my wounds be-gan now to abate a little, though I suffered extremely from the cold, as I did not dare to kindle a fire, from the fear of discovering myself by its light. Three nights and days did I lead this folitary life, in continual dread of the favage parties which scouted all the woods in purfuit of stragglers, and often past so near my place of retreat, that I gave myself over for lost. At length upon the fourth evening, fancying myself a little restored, and that the activity of the F 2 ememy enemy might be abated, I ventured out and purfued my march. I fcarcely need describe the various difficulties and dangers to which I was exposed in such a journey; however I still had with me my musquet, and as my ammunition was not quite exhausted, I depended upon the woods them-Telves to supply me with food. I travelled the greater part of the night, involving myself still deeper in these inextricable sorests; for I was afraid to pursue the direction of our former march, as I imagined the savages were dispersed along the country in pursuit of the sugitives. I therefore took a direction as nearly as I could judge parallel to the English settlements, and inclining to the South. In this manner, I forced my way along the woods all night, and with the morning had reason to think that I had a tvanced a confiderable distance. My wounds began now to pain me afresh with this exertion, and compelled me to allow myself some repose. I chose out the thickest covert I could find, and, shrowding myself as well as I was able, was soon over-powered by sleep. I did not awake till the sun had gained the meridian, and, creeping from my retreat, beheld with some degree of terror an enormous rattle-fnake that that was coiled up full in my way and feemed determined to oppose my passage. This animal is frequent in the southern colonies, and is the most possonous of all the reptiles that haunt the woods. He is in length from two to six feet, beautifully variegated with different colours, but the most remarkable circumstance attending him is a natural noise that he produces with every emotion of his tail, and which occasions too his name. I soon destroyed my hissing soe, and taking courage for the first time to kindle a fire, I roasted him upon the embers, and made the most delicious meal I ever remember upon his slesh.

What, exclaimed Tommy, is it possible to eat snakes? I thought they had been all over poison. Master, replied the highlander, the want of food will reconcile us tomany meats, which we should scarcely think eatable. Nothing has surprized memore than to see the poor, in various countries, complaining of the scarcity of food, yet throwing away every year thousands of the carcases of horses, which are full as wholesome and nourishing as bees, and are in many-countries preferred to it. But, in general, every animal may be eaten, and affords a falutary food; as to snakes, the poison of them is contained in the hollow of their teeth. When they bite, they instil their venom into the wound, which mixes with the blood, and without a timely remedy, destroys the sufferer. But if you cut off the head, the rest of the body is not only wholesome but palatable, and I have known it eaten as a delicacy by many inhabitants of the colonies .- Thus refreshed, therefore, I pursued my march through the same thick, gloomy country, without meeting the least appearance of an human creature; and at night, I cut, with an hatchet that I had about me, fome boughs, with which I erected a temporary shelter. The next day, as I was pursuing my march, I saw a deer bound by me, upon whose shoulders was fixed a sierce and destructive animal that resembles a tiger. This creature, which is about the fize of a moderate dog, ascends the trees and hides himself among the branches, till a deer, or any other animal that he can master, passes within his reach. He then darts himself with a fudden fpring, full upon the neck orshoulder of the unfortunate animal, which he continues tearing with fo much violence, that he foon dispatches him. This was actually the case with the poor deer that past me; for he had not run an hundred yards, before.

before he fell down in the agonies of death, and his destroyer began to regale himself upon the prey. I instantly saw that this was a lucky opportunity of supplying myself with food for several days; I therefore ran towards the animal, and by a violent shout made him abandon his victim and retire growling into the woods. I then kindled a sire with leaves and sticks, and, cutting off a large slice of venison, I plentifully refreshed myself for my journey. I then packed up as much of the most sleshy parts of the body as I could conveniently carry, and abandoned the rest to wild beasts. In this manner did I march for several days, without wanting food, or feeing any probable end of my fatigues. At length I found a lofty mountain before me, which I determined to ascend, imagining that such an elevation might enable me to make some useful discoveries in respect to the nature of the country I had to traverse, and perhaps present me with some appearances of cultivation or inhabitants. I therefore ascended with infinite fatigue a rough and stony af-cent of several miles, in which I was frequently obliged to clamber up pointed rocks, and work my way along the edge of dan-gerous precipices. I however arrived without an accident at the top, which was en-tirely bare of trees, and looking round me beheld a wild and defert country extended to a prodigious distance. Far as my eye could reach, I discovered nothing but so-rests on every side but one. There the country seemed to be more open, though equally uncultivated, and I saw meadows and favannahs opening one beyond another, bounded at length by a fpacious river, whose end and beginning were equally concealed from my eye. I was now so weary of this solitary kind of life, that I began to confider the inhabitants themselves with less apprehension; besides, I thought myself out of danger of meeting with the hostile tribes: and all these people, unless irritated by injuries or stimulated by revenge are perhaps less strangers to the rights of hospitality than any civilized nation. I, therefore, reslected, that by directing my course to the river, and following the direction of its waters. I should have the greatest probaits waters, I should have the greatest probability of meeting with some of my sellow-creatures; as the natives build their villages near lakes and streams, and choose their banks as a refidence, when they are employed in hunting. I there-

I therefore descended the mountain, and entered the level diffrict which I faw before me. I marched along an open campaign country for feveral hours, covered over with a rank species of grass, and beheld numerous herds of buffaloes grazing all around. It was here that an accident befel me, which I will relate for its singularity, both in re-spect to the dangers I incurred and my method of escape. As I was thus journeying on I discovered a prodigious light that seemed to essage the sun itself, and streak the skies with an angry kind of illumination. I looked round me to discover the cause of this strange appearance, and beheld, with equal horror and aftonishment, that the whole country behind was in flames. In order to explain this event, I must observe, that all the plains in America produce a rank; luxuriant vegetation, the juices of which are exhausted by the heat of the fummer's fun: it is then as inflammable as straw or fodder; and when a casual spark of fire communicates with it, the flame frequently drives before the wind for miles together, and consumes every thing it meets. This was actually the case at present; far as my eye could reach, the country was all in slames: a powerful wind F. 5. added.

added fresh fury to the fire, and drove it added fresh fury to the fire, and drove it on with a degree of swiftness which pre-cluded all possibility of slight. I must con-fess that I was struck with horror at the sudden approach of a death, so new, so dreadful, so unexpected. I saw it was in vain to sly; the slaming line extended for several miles on every side, and advanced with such velocity that I considered my state inevitable. I looked round me with a kind of mute despair, and began to envy the fate of my comrades who had fallen by honourable wounds in battle. Already did the conflagration fcorch me in its approach, accompanied by clouds of fmoke that almost suffocated me with their baneful vapour. In this extremity, fortune presented to my mind an instantaneous thought, which, perhaps, was the only possible me-thod of escape. I considered that nothing thod of elcape. I confidered that nothing could ftop the conflagration but an actual want of matter to continue it; and, therefore, by fetting fire to the vegetables before me, I might follow my own path in fafety. I hope, gentlemen, that during the course of a long life, you will never have occasion to experience the pleasure which the first glance of this expedient afforded to my mind. I saw myself snatched, beword yond yond expectation, from a strange and painful death, and instantly pulled out, with a trembling hand, the flint and fteel upon which my prefervation was to depend. ftruck a light and prefently kindled the drieft grass before me: the conflagration fpread along the country; the wind drove it on with inconceivable fury, and I faw the path of my deliverance open before my eyes. In a few feconds a confiderable vacancy was burnt before me, which I traverfed with the speed of a man that flies from instant death. My feet were scorched with the glowing foil, and feveral times had I been nearly suffocated with the drift of the pursuing smoke; but every step I made, convinced me of the certainty of my escape, and, in a little time, I stopped to consider at leisure the consagration I had avoided; which, after proceeding to the point whence I fet out, was extinguished, as I had foreseen, and delivered me from all. apprehension.

I declare, faid Tommy, this is the most extraordinary thing I ever heard; and yet I can easily conceive it, for I once saw some men set fire to the heath and surzes upon the common, and they burnt so suriously that I was quite afraid to come near the flame.

I purfued my way, continued the highlander, over the fmoking foil, which I had rendered bare to a considerable extent, and lodged at night, as usual, under some boughs which I stuck up to defend me. In the morning I fet out again, and foon arrived at a spacious lake, upon whose banks I could plainly discern the signs of an American encampment. I hesitated some time, whether I should again conceal myself in the woods, or deliver myfelf up to their mercy. But I considered that it was impossible long to continue this wandering life; and that, in the end, I must have recourse to some of those savage tribes for asfistance. What, therefore, must be done at last, it was fruitless to delay; I had every reason to imagine that the people before me must either be favourable to Great Britain, or at least indifferent to the war, and in either case, from the experience I possest of the manners of the natives, I did not think I had much to fear. I, therefore, determined to hazard every thing upon the probability of a favourable reception, and, collecting all my refolution, I marched boldly forward, forward, and foon arrived at the encampment. As foon as I entered the village the women and children gathered round me with the curiofity natural to mankind at the fight of an unaccustomed object. I: formed a favourable conjecture from this apparent ignorance of Europeans, and walking on with a composed step and steady countenance, I at length entered into one of the largest cabins I could find. When I was within, I faw a venerable old man, whom I took to be a chief from his appearance, fitting at his ease-upon the ground, and smoking. I saluted him with all the courtesy I was able, and placed myself upon the ground, at some little distance, waiting with inward anxiety, but external composure, for him to begin the conversation. After he had eyed me for some time with fixt attention, but without either sternness or anger, he calmly took the pipe from his mouth and presented it to me. I received it with infinite fatisfaction, for, as I have before remarked, this is always with the American tribes the firmest pledge of peace and a friendly reception. When we had thus been feated for some time in mutual contemplation of each other, he asked me; in a dialect which I understood tolerably well.

well, to eat. I did not think it prudent to refuse any offered civility, and therefore accepted the offer; and, in a little time, a young woman, who was in the back part of the hut, fet before me fome broiled fish and parched maize: After I had eaten, my friendly host inquired into my country and the reasons of my visit. I was just enough acquainted with the language he spoke to be able to understand him, and to give an intelligible, though imperfect, answer. I therefore explained to him, as well as I was a label what I had another than a rest water water. able, that I had crost the great water, with the warriors of the king of Britain; that we had been compelled to take up the hatchet against the French and their allies, and that we had actually fet out upon an expedition against their colonies; but that we had been furprized by a lurking party in the woods; that in the confusion of the fight I had been separated from the rest, and had wandered several days through the woods in fearch of my comrades; and that now feeing the tents of my brethren, the red men, I had come to visit them, and smoke the pipe of peace in their company. this I with some difficulty explained to my entertainer, who liftened to me with great attention, and then bade me welcome in the

the name of his nation, which he told me was called the Saukies; he added that their young men were dispersed through the woods, hunting the deer and buffalo; but they would soon return loaded with provisions, and in the mean time I might share his cabin, and such provisions as he could command. I thanked him for his offer, and remained several days in his hut, always entertained with the same hospitality, until the return of the young men from hunting. They came at last, in several boats, along the lake, bringing with them a considerable quantity of wild beasts which they had killed. I was received by all the tribe with the same hospitality I had experienced from the old chief; and, as it was necessary to gain their friendship as much as possible, I joined them in all their hunting and fishing parties, and soon acquired a considerable degree of skill in both.

Hunting itself has something cruel in the Hunting itself has something cruel in the practice; it is a species of war which we wage with brute animals for their spoils; but if ever it can be considered as excuseable, it is in these savage nations, who have recourse to it for their subsistence. They are active, bold, and dexterous, to such a degree in all these everises, that none of the degree in all these exercises, that none of the wild animals they attack have the smallest chance of escape. Their parties generally consist of almost all the youth of their nation, who go in a body to particular dif-tricts where they know game is plentiful. Their common method is, when they are arrived at a spot which abounds in deer or buffaloes, to disperse themselves through the woods; and then, alarming the beafts in the neighbourhood, they drive them with shouts and dogs towards some common place, which is always in the middle of alltheir parties. When they have thus rouzed their prey, the various squadrons gradually advance towards, the centre till they unite: in a circle, and inclose a prodigious number of frightened animals. They then attack them either with fire-arms or arrows, and shoot them down successively. By these means they are fure, in a single day, to destroy a prodigious number of different beasts. But it sometimes happens, that while they are engaged in the chace of otheranimals, they become a prey themselves to their enemies; who take this method of furprizing them in the woods and gratifying their resentment. This was actually the case with my friends the Saukies, and produced a furprizing event; the consequence of which was my return to the English colonies in fafety.

The Saukies had been long at war with the Iroquese, a powerful tribe of Northern Americans in the interest of the French. The Iroquese had received intelligence of the fituation of the Saukies encampment, and determined to surprize them. For this purpose, a thousand warriors set out by a fecret march, through the woods, and travelled with the filence and celerity which are peculiar to all these nations. they had nearly approached the hunting grounds of their enemies, they happened to be discovered upon their march, by four warriors of another nation, who instantly fuspected their design, and, running with greater diligence than it was possible so large a body could make, arrived at the encampment of the Saukies, and informed them of the near approach of their enemies. A great council was instantly assembled to deliberate upon the choice of proper meafures for their defence. As they were incumbered with their families, it was impracticable to retreat with fafety; and it feemed equally difficult to relift to large a force with inferior numbers. While they were in this uncertainty, I confidered the nature nature of their fituation, and had the good fortune to find out a resource, which being communicated to my friend the chief, and adopted by the nation, was the means of their fafety. I observed that the passage to the Saukie camp for the Iroquese lay along a narrow slip of land, which extended for near a mile between two lakes. I, therefore, advifed the Saukies to cast up a strong barrier at the end of the passage; which I shewed them how to strengthen with ditches, palifades, and fome of the improvements of European fortification. Their number of warriors amounted to about four hundred; these I divided into equal parts, and leaving one to defend the lines, I placed. the other in ambuscade along the neighbouring woods. Scarcely were these dispositions finished before the Iroquese appeared, and imagining they were rushing upon an unguarded foe, entered the desile without hefitation. As foon as the whole body was thus imprudently engaged, the other party of the Saukies started from their hiding places, and running to the entrance of the strait, threw up in an instant another fortification, and had the satisfaction to see the whole force of their enemies thus circumvented and caught in a trap. The Iroquese quefe foon perceived the difficulty and danger of escape. They however behaved with that extraordinary composure which is the peculiar characteristic of this people on every occasion. The lakes were at that time frozen over, yet not so hard as to permit them to effect a passage over the ice, and though a thaw succeeded in a short time, it was equally impracticable to pass by swimming, or on rafts. Three days therefore the Ironuese remained quiet in this by issimming, or on rafts. Three days therefore the Iroquese remained quiet in this disagreeable situation; and, as if they had nothing to apprehend, diverted themselves all this time with fishing. On the fourth morning they judged the ice sufficiently dissolved to attempt their escape; and, therefore, cutting down some trees which grew upon the strait, they formed them into rafts and embarked their whole force. But this could not be done without the knowledge of the Saukies, who difpatched a confiderable body of warriors to oppose their landing. It is unnecessary to relate all the horrid particulars of the engagement which enfued; I will only mention that the Iroquefe at length effected their landing with the loss of half their number, and retreated precipitately to their own country, leaving behind them all the furs and skins which they had taken in their hunting. The share I had had in this success gained me the friendship of all the nation; and, at my defire, they sent some of their young men to guide me through the woods to the English settlements, and took their leave of me with every expression of esteem, and a considerable present of valuable furs.

These, gentlemen, are the most important and interesting of my adventures; and as I have already trespassed too long upon your patience, I shall hasten to conclude my story. After this, I was employed in various parts of America and the West Indies, during the rest of the war. 1 suffered hardships and difficulties innumerable, and acquired, as my father had foretold, a little wisdom at the price of a considerable quantity of blood. When the war was ended, I found myself nearly in the same situation as I began, except the present of my friendly Americans, which I had turned into money and remitted to England. I, therefore, now began to feel my military enthufiafin abated, and having permission to leave the service, I embraced that opportunity of returning to my country, fully determined to spend the remainder of my life amid my family and friends. I found my father-father and mother still living, who received me in the fondest manner. I then employed the little fund I had acquired to stock a farm, which I hired in the neighbourhood, and where I imagined my care and industry would be sufficient to ensure us all a comfortable sublistence. Some little time after, I married a virtuous and industrious young woman, the mother of the unfortunate children who are fo much indebted to your bounty. For some time I made a shift to fucceed tolerably well: but at length the distresses of my country increasing, I found myself involved in the deepest poverty. Several years of uncommon severity destroyed my cattle, which is the chief support of the highlanders, and rotted the scanty crops, which were to supply us with food, when the ground of the country of the country of the crown the ground. upon the ground. I cannot accuse myself of either voluntary unthriftiness or neglect of my business; but there are some situations in which it feems impossible for human exertion to stem the torrent of misfortune. But wherefore should I give pain to fuch kind and worthy benefactors, by a detail of all the miseries which I, and many of my poor countrymen, have endured?-I will therefore only mention, that after having suffered, I think, every distress which human human nature is equal to support; after having seen my tender parents, and last, my dear, unfortunate wife, perish by the hardships of our situation, I took the resolution of for ever abandoning a country which feemed incapable of supporting its inhabitants. I thought that the milder climate and more fertile foil of America might perhaps enable a wretched wanderer, who asked no more than food for his starving children, to drag on, a little longer, a miserable life. With this idea, I sold the remainder of my flock, and after having paid whatever was due to my landlord, I found I had just enough to transport myself and family into eternal banishment. I reached a sea-port town, and embarked with my children on board a ship that was setting sail for Phila-delphia. But the same ill fortune seemed still to accompany my steps; for a dreadful ftorm arose, which, after having tossed our veffel during feveral days, wrecked us at length upon the coast. All the crew, in-deed, escaped, and with infinite difficulty I faved these dear, but miserable infants, who now accompany me; but when I reflect upon my fituation, in a distant country, without resources, friends, or hopes, I am almost inclined to think, that we might all have have been happier in the bosom of the ocean.

Here the highlander finished his story, and all the company were affected with the recital of his distresses. They all endeavoured to comfort him with the kindest expressions and promises of assistance, but Miss Simmons, after the had with some difficulty composed herself enough to speak, asked the man if his name was not Andrew Campbell. The highlander answered with fome surprize, it was. Then, said she, you will find that you have a friend, whom, as yet, you are not acquainted with, who has both the ability and the will to ferve you. That friend, added she, seeing all the company were aftonished, is no other than my uncle. That Colonel Simmons, whom you have described with so much feeling and affection, was brother to my father, and confequently uncle to myfelf. It is no wonder that the memory of fuch a man should be venerated by all his relations. I have often heard my uncle speak of his untimely death as the greatest misfortune which ever happened to our family; and I have often feen him read, with tears in his eyes, many of his brother's letters, in which he speaks with the

the greatest affection of his faithful highlander, Andrew Campbell.

At these words the poor highlander, unable to repress the strong emotions of his mind, sprang forward in a suddén transport of joy, and, without consideration of circumstances, caught Mis Simmons in his cumstances, caught Mils Simmons in his arms, exclaiming at the fame time, Praised be God for this happy and unexpected meeting! Blessed be my shipwreck itself, that has given me an opportunity of seeing, before I die, some of the blood of my dear and worthy colonel! and perceiving Miss Simmons confused at this abrupt and unexpected falutation, he added, in the most respectful manner: Pardon me, my honoured young lac'y, for the improper liberty I have taken; but I was not master of myself to find, at a time when I thought myself to find, at a time when I thought myself. felf to find, at a time when I thought my-felf the most forlorn and miserable of the human race, that I was in company with the nearest relation of the man, that, after my own father, I have always loved and re-verenced most. Miss Simmons answered, with the greatest affability, that she freely excused the warmth of his affection; and that fhe would that very day acquaint her uncle with this extraordinary event; who, fhe did not doubt, would come over with the greatest expedition to see a person whom he knew so well by name, and who could inform him of so many particulars of her uncle.

And now the company being separated, Tommy, who had liftened with filent attention to the story of the highlander, took an opportunity of following Mr. Barlow, who was walking out; and when he perceived they were alone, he looked at him as if he had some weighty matter to disclose, but was unable to give it utterance... Mr. Barlow, therefore, turned towards him with the greatest kindness, and, taking him tenderly by the hand, inquired what he wished. Indeed, sir, answered Tommy, almost crying, I am scarcely able to tell you. But I have been a very bad and ungrateful boy, and I am afraid you no longer have the same affection for me.

Mr. BARLOW.

If you are fensible of your faults, my little friend, that is a very great step towards amending them. Let me therefore know what it is, the recollection of which distresses you so much, and if it is in my power to assist in making you easy, there is nothing, I am sure, which I shall be inclined to refuse you.

Vol. III. G Tommy.

TOMMY.

Oh! fir, your speaking to me with so much goodness hurts me a great deal more than if you were to be very angry. For when people are angry and passionate, one does not so much mind what they say. But when you speak with so much kindness it seems to pierce me to the very heart, because I know I have not deserved it.

Mr. BARLOW.

But if you are fensible of having committed any faults, you may resolve to behave so well for the suture, that you may deserve every body's friendship and esteem. Few people are so perfect as not to err sometimes; and if you are convinced of your errors, you will be more cautious how you give way to them a second time.

Томму.

Indeed, fir, I am very happy to hear you fay fo—I will then tell you every thing which lies so heavy upon my mind. You must know then, fir, that, although I have lived so long with you, and, during all that time, you have taken so much pains to improve me in every thing, and teach me to act well to every body, I had no sooner quitted quitted your fight, than I became, 1 think, a worse boy than ever I was before.

Mr. BARLOW.

But why do you judge so severely of yourself, as to think you were become worse than ever? Perhaps you have been a little thoughtless and giddy, and these are faults which I cannot with truth say you were ever free from.

Томму.

No, fir, what I have been guilty of is infinitely worse than ever. I have always been very giddy and very thoughtless; but I never imagined I could have been the most infolent and ungrateful boy in the world.

Mr. BARLOW.

You frighten me, my little friend.—Is it possible you can have committed actions that deserve so harsh a name?

Томму.

You shall judge yourself, sir; for now I have begun, I am determined to tell you all. You know, sir, that when I first came to you, I had an high opinion of myself for being born a gentleman, and a very G2 great great contempt for every body in an inferior station.

Mr. BARLOW.

I must confess you have always had some tendency to both those follies.

Томму.

Yes, fir; but you have so often laughed at me upon the subject, and shown me the solly of people's imagining themselves better than others, without any merit of their own, that I was grown a little wifer. Besides, I have so often observed that those I despised could do a variety of things which I was ignorant of, while those who are vain of being gentlemen can do nothing useful or ingenious, that I had begun to be ashamed of my folly. But since I came home, I kept company with a great many sine young gentlemen and ladies that thought themselves superior to all the rest of the world, and used to despise every one else, and they have made me forget every thing I learned before.

Mr. BARLOW.

Perhaps then I was mistaken, when I taught you that the greatest merit any perfon could have, is to be good and useful; these these fine young gentlemen and ladies may be wifer, and have given you better lessons. If that is the case, you will have great reason to rejoice that you have changed so much for the better.

TOMMY.

No, fir, no; I never thought them either good or wife; for they know nothing but how to dress their hair and buckle their shoes. But they persuaded me that it was necessary to be polite, and talked to me so often upon the subject, that I could not help believing them.

Mr. BARLOW.

I am very glad to hear that; it is neceffary for every body to be polite. They therefore, I suppose, instructed you to be more obliging and civil in your manners than ever you were before. Instead of doing you any hurt, this will be the greatest improvement you can receive.

TOMMY.

No, fir, quite the contrary—Inflead of teaching me to be civil and obliging, they have made me ruder and worse behaved than ever I was before.

G 3 Mr.

Mr. BARLOW.

If that is the case, I fear these fine young gentlemen and ladies undertook to teach you more than they understood themfelves.

TOMMY.

Indeed, fir, I am of the fame opinion myself. But I did not think so then, and, therefore, I did whatever I observed them do, and talked in the same manner as I heard them talk. They used to be always laughing at Harry Sandsord; and I grew so foolish that I did not choose to keep company with him any longer.

Mr. BARLOW.

That was a pity, because I am convinced he really loves you. However, it is of no great consequence, for he has employment enough at home; and, however ingenious you may be, I do not think that he will learn how to manage his land, or raise food, from your conversation. It will, therefore, be better for him to converse with farmers, and leave you to the society of gentlemen. Indeed, this, I know, has always been his taste, and had not your father prest him very much to accompany you home, he would would have liked much better to avoid the visit. However, I will inform him that you have gained other friends, and advise him, for the future, to avoid your company.

Томму.

Oh, fir! I did not think you could be fo cruel. I love Harry Sandford better than any other boy in the world, and I shall never be happy till he forgives me all my bad behaviour, and converses with me again as he used to do.

Mr. BARLOW.

But then, perhaps, you may lofe the acquaintance of all those polite young gentlemen and ladies.

Томму.

I care very little about that, fir. But, I fear, I have behaved so ill, that he never will be able to forgive me and love me as he did formerly.

Tommy then went on, and repeated with great exactness the story of his insolence and ingratitude, which had so great an effect upon him, that he burst into tears and cried a considerable time. He then concluded with asking Mr. Barlow if he thought Harry would be ever able to forgive him.

G 4 Mr.

Mr. BARLOW.

I cannot conceal from you, my little friend; that you have acted very ill indeed in this affair. However, if you are really ashamed of all your past conduct, and determined to act better, I do not doubt that so generous and good-natured a boy as Harry is, will forgive you all.

Томму.

O, fir, I should be the happiest creature in the world—Will you be so kind as to bring him here to day, and you shall see how I will behave?

Mr. B'ARLOW.

Softly, Tommy, foftly. What is Harry to come here for? Have you not infulted and abused him, without reason; and, at last, proceeded so far as to strike him, only because he was giving you the best advice, and endeavouring to preserve you from danger? Can you imagine that any human being will come to you in return for such treatment? at least till you have convinced him that you are ashamed of your passion and injustice, and that he may expect better usage for the future.

TOMMY.

Томму.

What then must I do, sir?

Mr. BARLOW.

If you want any future connection with Harry Sandford, it is your business to go to him and tell him fo.

TOMMY.

What, fir, go to a farmer's, to expose myself before all his family?

Mr. BARLOW.

Just now you told me you were ready to do every thing, and yet you cannot take the trouble of visiting your friend at his own house. You then imagine that a perfon does not expose himself by acting wrong, but by acknowledging and amending his faults?

Томму.

But what would every body fay, if a young gentleman like me, was to go and .. beg pardon of a farmer's fon?

Mr. BARLOW. . .

They will probably fay that you have a more sense and gratitude than they expected. However, you are to act as you please; with with the fentiments you still seem to entertain, Harry will certainly be a very unsit companion, and you will do much better to cultivate the new acquaintance you have made.

Mr. Barlow was then going away, but Tommy burst again into tears and begged him not to go; upon which Mr. Barlow said, I do not want to leave you, Tommy, but our conversation is now at an end. You have asked my advice, which I have given you freely. I have told you how you ought to act, if you would preserve the esteem of any good or sensible friend, or prevail upon Harry to excuse your past behaviour. But as you do not approve of what I suggested, you must follow your own opinions.

Pray, fir, pray fir, faid Tommy fobbing, do not go. I have used Harry Sandford in the most barbarous manner; my father is angry with me; and if you desert me, I shall have no friend lest in the world.

Mr. BARLOW.

That will be your own fault, and, therefore, you will not deferve to be pitied. Is it not in your own power to preferve all your friends, by an honest confession of your faults? Your father will be pleased, Harry Sandford will heartily forgive you, and I shall retain the same good opinion of your character which I have long had.

Томму,

And is it really possible, fir, that you should have a good opinion of me, after all I have told you about myself?

Mr. BARLOW.

I have always thought you a little vain and carelefs, I confets; but, at the fame time, I imagined you had both good fenfe and generofity in your character; I depended upon the first to make you see your faults, and upon the second to correct them.

TOMMY.

Dear fir, I am very much obliged to you: but you have always been extremely kind and friendly to me.

Mr. BARLOW.

And, therefore, I told your father yesterday, who is very much hurt at your quarrel with Harry, that though a sudden G 6 passion passion might have transported you too far, yet, when you came to consider the matter coolly, you would perceive your faults and acknowledge them: were you not to be-have in this manner, I owned I could fay nothing in your favour. And I was very much confirmed in this opinion, when I faw the courage you exerted in the rescue of Harry's lamb, and the compassion you felt for the poor highlander. A boy, faid I, who has so many excellent dispositions, can never persist in bad behaviour. He may do wrong by accident, but he will be ashamed of his errors, and endeavour to repair them by a frank and generous acknow-This has always been the conledgment. duct of really great and elevated minds; while mean and groveling ones alone imagine that it is necessary to persist in faults they have once committed.

TOMMY.

Oh, fir!—I will go directly, and intreat Harry to forgive me; I am convinced that all you fay is right.—But will you not go with me? Do, pray, fir, be fo good.—

Mr. BARLOW.

Gently, gently, my good friend; you are always for doing every thing in an inftant.

I am very glad you have taken a refolution which will do you so much credit, and give so much satisfaction to your own mind: but before you execute it, I think it will be necessary to speak to your father and mother upon the subject, and, in the mean time, I will go and pay a visit to sarmer Sandsord, and bring you an account of Harry.

Томму.

Do, fir, be so good; and tell Harry, if you please, that there is nothing I desire so much as to see him; and that nothing shall ever make me behave ill again. I have heard too, sir, that there was a poor black, that came begging to us, who saved Harry from the bull; if I could but find him out, I would be good to him as long as I live.

Mr. Barlow commended Tommy very much for dispositions so full of gratitude and goodness, and taking leave of him, went to communicate the conversation he had just had to Mr. Merton. That gentleman selt the sincerest pleasure at the account, and entreated Mr. Barlow to go directly to prepare Harry to receive his son. That little boy, added he, has the noblest mind mind that ever adorned an human being; nor shall I ever be happy till I see my son acknowledging all his faults, and intreating forgiveness: for, with the virtues that I have discovered in his soul, he appears to me a more eligible friend and companion than noblemen or princes.

Mr. Barlow, therefore, fet out on foot, though Mr. Merton would have fent his carriage and fervants to attend him, and foon arrived at Mr. Sandford's farm. It was a pleasant spot, situated upon gentle declivity of an hill, at the foot of which winded along a swift and clear little stream. The house itself was small, but warm and convenient, furnished with the greatest simplicity, but managed with perfect neatness. As Mr. Barlow approached, he saw the owner himself guiding a plough through one of his own fields, and Harry, who had now resumed the farmer, directed the horses. But when he saw Mr. Barlow coming across the field, he stopt his team, and letting fall his whip, sprang forward to meet him with all the unaffected eagerness of joy. As foon as Harry had faluted Mr. Barlow, and inquired after his health, heasked him with the greatest kindness after Tommy; for I fancy, fir, faid he, by the way which I fee you come, you have been at Mr. Merton's house. Indeed I have, replied Mr. Barlow, but I am very forry to find that Tommy and you are not upon as good terms as you formerly were.

HARRY.

Indeed, fir, I am very forry for it myfelf. But I do not know that I have given master Merton any reason to change his sentiments about me: and though I do not think he has treated me as well as he ought to do, I have the greatest desire to hear that he is well.

Mr. BARLOW.

That you might have known yourself, had you not left Mr. Merton's house so suddenly, without taking leave of any one, even your friend Mr. Merton, who has always treated you with so much kindness.

HARRY.

Indeed, sir, I shall be very unhappy if you think I have done wrong; but be so good as to tell me how I could have acted otherwise. I am very sorry to appear to accuse master Merton, neither do I bear any resentment against him for what he has done, but since you speak to me upon the

the subject, I shall he obliged to tell the truth.

Mr. BARLOW.

Well, Harry, let me hear it. You know I shall be the last person to condemn you if . you do not deserve it.

HARRY.

I know your conftant kindness to me, sir, and I always confide in it: however, I am not fensible now that I am in fault. know, fir, that it was with great unwillingness I went to Mr. Merton's, for I thought there would be fine gentlemen and ladies there that would ridicule my dress and manners: and though master Merton has been always very friendly in his behaviour towards. me, I could not help thinking that he might grow ashamed of my company at his. own house.

Mr. BARLOW.

Do you wonder at that, Harry, confidering the difference there is in your rank and 3 fortune?

HARRY.

No, fir, I cannot fay I do, for I generally observe that those who are rich will scarcely treat treat the poor with common civility. But, in this particular case, I did not see any reason for it. I never desired master Merton to admit me to his company or invite me to his house, because I knew that I was born and bred in a very inferior station. You were so good as to take me to your house, and there I became acquainted with him; and if I was then much in his company, it was because he seemed to desire it himself, and I always endeavoured to treat him with the greatest respect.

Mr. BARLOW.

That, indeed, is true, Harry; in all your little plays and studies I have never observed any thing but the greatest mildness and goodnature on your part.

HARRY.

I hope, fir, it has never been otherwise. But though I have the greatest affection for master Merton, I never desire to go home with him. What fort of a figure could a poor boy like me make at a gentleman's table, among little master and misses that powder their hair, and wear buckles as big as our horses carry upon their harness? If I attempted to speak, I was always laughed at, or if I did any thing, I was fure to hear fomething about clowns and ruftics! And yet, I think, though they were all gentlemen and ladies, you would not much have approved of their conversation, for it was about nothing but plays, and dress, and trifles of that nature. I never heard one of them mention a fingle word about saying their prayers, or being dutiful to their parents, or doing any good to the poor.

Mr. BARLOW.

Well, Harry, but if you did not like their conversation, you surely might have borne it with patience for a little while: and then, I heard something about your being quarressome.

HARRY.

Oh, fir, I hope not.—I was to be fure once a little passionate, but that I could not help, and I hope you will forgive me. There was a modest, sensible young lady, that was the only person who treated me with any kindness; and a bold, forward, ill-natured boy, affronted her in the grossest manner, only because she took notice of me. Could I help taking her part? Have you not told me too, sir, that every person, though though he should avoid quarrels, has a right to defend himself when he is attacked?

Mr. BARLOW.

Well, Harry, I do not much blame you, from the circumstances I have heard of that affair: but why did you leave Mr. Merton's family so abruptly, without speaking to any body, or thanking Mr. Merton himself for the civilities he had shown you? Was that right?

HARRY.

Oh, dear, fir, I have cried about it feveral times, for I think I must appear very rude and ungrateful to Mr. Merton. But as to master Tommy, I did not leave him while I thought I could be of any use. He treated me, I must say, in a very unworthy manner; he joined with all the other fine little gentlemen in abusing me, only because I endeavoured to persuade them not to go to a bull-baiting; and then at last he struck me. I did not strike him again, because I loved him so much, in spite of all his unkindness; nor did I leave him till I saw he was quite sase in the hands of his own fervants. And, then, how could I go back to his house, after what he had done to me?

I did not choose to complain of him to Mt. Merton; and how could I behave to him as I had done before without being guilty of meanness and falsehood? And therefore I thought it better to go home, and desire you to speak to Mr. Merton; and intreat him to forgive my rudeness.

Mr. BARLOW.

Well, Harry, I can inform you that Mr. Merton is perfectly fatisfied upon that account. But there is one circumstance you have not mentioned, my little friend, and that is your faving Tommy's life from the fury of the enraged bull.

HARRY.

As to that, sir, I hope I should have done the same for any human creature. But I believe that neither of us would have efcaped, if it had not been for the poor courageous black, that came to our affistance.

Mr. BARLOW.

I fee, Harry, that you are a boy of a noble and generous spirit, and I highly approve of every thing you have done: but, are you determined to forsake Tommy Merton

SANDFORD AND MERTON. 165 Merton for ever, because he has once behaved ill?

HARRY.

I, fir! no, I am fure. But, though I am poor, I do not defire the acquaintance of any body that despises me. Let him keep company with his gentlemen and ladies, I am satisfied with companions in my own station. But surely, fir, it is not I that for-sake him, but he that has cast me off.

Mr. BARLOW.

But if he is forry for what he has done, and only defires to acknowledge his faults, and obtain your pardon?

HARRY.

Oh, dear, fir! I should forget every thing in an instant. I knew master Tommy was always a little passionate and headstrong; but he is at the same time generous and good-natured; nor would he, I am sure, have treated me so ill, if he had not been encouraged to it by the other young gentlemen.

Mr. BARLOW.

Well, Harry, I believe your friend is thoroughly fensible of his faults, and that you you will have little to fear for the future. He is impatient till he fees you and asks your forgiveness

HARRY.

Oh, fir, I should forgive him if he had beaten me an hundred times. But, though I cannot leave the horses now, if you will be so kind to wait a little, I dare say my father will let me go when he leaves off ploughing.

Mr. BARLOW.

No, Harry, there is no occasion for that. Tommy has indeed used you ill, and ought to acknowledge it; otherwise he will not deserve to be trusted again. He will call upon you, and tell you all he feels upon the occasion. In the mean time, I was desired, both by him and Mr. Merton, to enquire after the poor negro that served you so materially and saved you from the bull.

HARRY.

He is at our house, sir; for I invited him home with me; and, when my father heard how well he had behaved, he made him up a little bed over the stable, and gives him victuals every day; and the poor man seems very thankful and industrious, and says he would gladly do any kind of work to earn his substitence.

Mr. Barlow then took his leave of Harry, and, after having spoken to his father, returned to Mr. Merton. During his absence, Mr. Simmons had arrived there to fetch away his niece: but, when he had heard the story of the highlander, he per-fectly recollected his name and character, and was touched with the fincerest compassion for his sufferings. Upon conversing with the poor man, he found that he was extremely well acquainted with agriculture, as well as truly industrious, and therefore instantly proposed to settle him in a small farm of his own, which happened to be vacant. The poor man received this unexpected change in his fortune with tears of joy, and every mark of unaffected grati-tude; and Mr. Merton, who never wanted generofity, infifted upon having a share in his establishment. He proposed to supply him with the necessary instruments of agriculture, and a couple of horses, to begin the culture of his land. Just in that moment, Mr. Barlow entered, and, when he had heard, with the fincerest pleasure, the improvement of his circumstances, begged permission to share in so benevolent an action.

action. I have an excellent milch cow, faid he, which I can very well spare, whose milk will speedily recruit the strength of these poor children; and I have half a dozen ewes and a ram, which I hope, under Mr. Campbell's management, will soon increase to a numerous slock. The poor highlander seemed almost frantic with such a profusion of unexpected blessings, and said, that he wished nothing more than to pass the remainder of his days in such a generous nation, and to be enabled to show at least the sentiments which such undeserved generosity had excited.

At night, Mr. Merton, who was defirous, by every method, to support the good impressions which had now taken possession of Tommy's mind, proposed that Miss Simmons should favour them with the conclusion of the story which she had begun the night before. That young lady instantly complied, and read them

The Conclusion of the Story of Sophron and Tigranes.

THE venerable Chares continued his narration thus: I passed several months among the Arabians, delighted with the simplicity of their life and the innocence of their manners: and would to heaven, added he, with a figh, that I had accepted their friendly invitations, and never quitted the filence of their hospitable deserts! How many scenes should I have avoided, which fill these aged eyes with tears, and pierce my foul with horror, as often as I recollect them! I should not have been witness to such a waste of human blood, nor traced the gradual ruin of my country. I fhould not have feen our towns involved in flames, nor our helpless children the captives of fell barbarians. But it is in vain for human beings to repine at the just decrees of Providence, which have configned every people to mifery and fervitude that abandon virtue, and attach themfelves to the pursuit of pleafure.

I left Arabia, with an heart penetrated with gratitude and admiration for its virtuous and benevolent inhabitants. They difmiffed me with every mark of kindness and hospitality, guided me over their dreary deferts, and, at parting, presented me with one of those beautiful horses, which are the admiration of all the surrounding nations. I will not trouble you with an account of the different countries which I wandered over in search of wisdom and experience. At length Vol. III.

I returned to my native city, determined to pass the rest of my life in obscurity and retirement: for the refult of all my observations was, that he is happieft, who paffes his time in innocent employments and the observation of nature. I had seen the princes and nobles of the earth repining in the midst of their splendid enjoyments, disgusted with the empty pageantry of their situation, and wishing, in vain, for the humble tranquillity of private life. I had visited many of the principal cities in feveral countries where I had travelled, but I had uniformly observed, that the miferies and crimes of mankind increased with their numbers. I therefore determined to avoid the general contagion, by fixing my abode in some sequestered fpot, at a distance from the passions and pursuits of my fellow-creatures. I collected the remainder of my effects, and with them purchased a little farm and vineyard in a beautiful and folitary spot near the sea. Soon afterwards I married a virtuous young woman, and, in her fociety, enjoyed for feveral years as great a degree of tranquillity as generally falls to the lot of man. I did not disdain to exercise with my own hands the different employments of agriculture; for I thought man was dishonoured by that indolence indolence which renders him a burthen to his fellow-creatures, not by that industry which is necessary to the support of his species. I, therefore fometimes guided the plough with my own hands, fometimes laboured in a little garden which supplied us with excel-lent fruits and herbs. I tended the cattle, whose patient labour enabled us to subdue the foil, and considered myself as only repaying part of the obligations I had received. My wife too exercifed herfelf in domestic cares; she milked the sheep and goats, and chiefly prepared the food of the family. Amid my other employments, I did not entirely forget the study of philosophy, which had charmed me fo much in my early youth. I frequently observed, with admiration, the wisdom and contrivance which were displayed in all the productions of nature, and the perfections of all her works. I used to walk amid the coolness and stillness of the evening, feeding my mind with pleasing meditations upon the power and wildom which have originally produced and ftill support this frame of things. I turned my eyes upon the earth, and faw it covered with innumerable animals, that sported upon its surface, and found each according to his nature, subsistence adapted to his wants. I faw the air and water themfelves teeming with life, and peopled with innumerable swarms of insects. I saw, that throughout the whole extent of the creation, as far as I was capable of observing it, nothing was waste or desolate; every thing was replete with life, and adapted to support it. These reslections continually excited in my mind new gratitude and veneration for that mysterious Being, whose goodness presides over such an infinite variety of beings. I endeavoured to elevate my thoughts to contemplate his nature and qualities; I, however, found my faculties too bounded to comprehend the infinite perfections of his nature. I therefore con-tented myself with imperfectly tracing him in his works, and adoring him as the common friend and parent of all his creatures.

Nor did I confine myfelf to these speculations, however sublime and consolatory to the human heart. Destined as we are to inhabit this globe of earth, it is our interest to be acquainted with its nature and the properties of its productions. For this reason, I particularly examined all the vegetables which are capable of becoming the food of man, or of the various animals which contribute to his support; I studied their qualities, the foil in which they delighted, the the improvements which might be made in every species. I sometimes wandered among the neighbouring mountains, and wherever the fall of rocks, or the repeated violence of torrents, had borne away the foil, I confidered, with filent admiration, the various substances which we call by the common name of earth. These I used to collect and mingle with the mould of my own garden, by which means I frequently made useful discoveries in fertilizing the soil, and increasing the quantity of food.

I also considered the qualities of the air which surrounds and sustains all living animals. I particularly remarked the noxious or falutary effects it is able to produce upon their constitutions, and, by these means, was frequently enabled to give useful counsels to all the neighbourhood. A large tract of ground had been formerly deluged by the fea, and the waters, finding no convenient vent, spread themselves all around, and converted a large extent of foil into a filthy marsh. Every year, when the heat of sum-mer prevailed, the atmosphere was filled with putrid exhalations, which produced fevers and pestilential disorders among the inhabitants. Touched with compassion for the evils which they endured, I persuaded them to undertake the task of draining the soil, and letting off the supersuous waters. This I instructed them to do with such success, that, in a short time, an unwholsome desert became covered with the most suxuriant harvests, and was deprived of all its noxious insuence. By thus rendering my services useful to my sellow-creatures, I received the purest reward which can attend the increase of knowledge, the consciousness of performing my duty, and humbly imitating that Being, whose goodness is as general and unbounded as his power.

Amid these tranquil and innocent employments, my life slowed gently away like a clear and even stream; I was a stranger to avarice, to ambition, and to all the cares which agitate the bulk of mortals. Alternate labour and study preserved the vigour both of body and mind; our wants were sew and easily gratisted; we chiefly subsisted upon the liberal returns of the earth, and seldom polluted our table with the bodies of slaughtered animals. One only child, the unfortunate girl who owes her preservation to the courage of this young man, was granted to our prayers. But in her we found enough to exercise exercise all the affections of our minds. We hung with extacy upon her innocent finiles, and remarked her opening graces with all the partiality of parental fondness. As she grew up, her mother instructed her in all the arts and employments of her sex; while I, who already saw the tempest gathering, which has fince burst with such fatal fury upon my country, thought it necessary to arm her mind with all the firmness which education can bestow. For this reason, I endeavoured to give both to her mind and body a degree of vigour, which is feldom found in the female fex. As foon as the was fufficiently advanced in strength to be capable of the lighter labours of husbandry and gardening, I employed her as my constant companion. Selene, for that was her name, foon acquired a dexterity in all these rustic employments, which I considered with equal pleafure and admiration. If women are in general feeble both in body and mind, it arises less from nature than from education. encourage a vicious indolence and inactivity, which we fallely call delicacy; instead of hardening their minds by the feverer principles of reason and philosophy, we breed them to useless arts, which terminate in vanity and fenfuality. In most of the countries H4 which

which I had visited, they are taught nothing of an higher nature than a few modulations of the voice, or useless postures of the body; their time is confumed in floth or trifles, and trifles become the only pursuits capable of interesting them. We seem to forget, that it is upon the qualities of the female fex, that our own domestic comforts, and the education of our children must depend. And what are the comforts or the education which a race of beings, corrupted from their infancy, and unacquainted with all the duties of life, are fitted to bestow? To touch a mufical instrument with useless skill, to exhibit their natural or affected graces to the eyes of indolent and debauched young men, to diffipate their husband's patrimory in riotous and unnecessary expences, these are the only arts cultivated by women in most of the polished nations I had seen. And the consequences are uniformly such as may be expected to proceed from fuch polluted fources, private misery, and public servitude.

But Selene's education was regulated by different views, and conducted upon severer principles; if that can be called severity, which opens the mind to a sense of moral and religious duties, and most effectually arms it against the inevitable evils of life.

With

With the rifing fun she left her bed, and accompanied me to the garden or the vine-yard. Her little hands were employed in shortening the luxurious shoots of fruitful trees, that supplied our table with wholesome and delicious fruits; or in supporting the branches of such as sunk beneath their load. Sometimes she collected water from a clear and constant rill that rolled along the valley, and recruited the force of plants that were exhausted by the fun. With what delight did 1 view her innocent chearfulness and assiduity! With what pleasure did she receive the praises which I gave to her skill and industry; or hear the lessons of wisdom and the examples of virtuous women, which I used to read her at evening, out of the writings of celebrated philosophers which I had collected in my travels!

But fuch a life was too unchecquered with misfortune to laft. The first stroke which attacked and almost destroyed my hopes of good, was the untimely loss of my dear and virtuous wife. The pestilential heats of autumn overpowered her tender frame, and raised a consuming sever in her veins. For fome time the struggled against the difease, but at length her pure and innocent spirit forfook this earth for ever, and left me, comfortless and forlorn, to mourn her loss.

I will not, my worthy hofts, attempt to describe the inexpressible distress which seized my foul at feeing myself thus deserted. There are some philosophers that aspire to triumph over human feelings, and consider all tender affections as difgraceful weaknesses: for my part, I have never pretended to that degree of infensibility. I have, indeed, opposed as criminal, that habitual acquiescence in sorrow which renders us unfit for the discharge of our duties; but while I have endeavoured to act, I have never blushed at feeling, like a man. Even now that time has mitigated the keenness of the fmart, I feel the habitual anguish of an incurable wound. But let me rather hasten to relate the sew remaining events of an uniform, unvaried life, than detain you with an useless repetition of my forrows.

Scarcely had time afforded me a feeble comfort, when the recollection of past misfortunes was almost extinguished by the new ones which overwhelmed my country. The fertile plains of Syria abounded in all the necessaries and conveniencies of life. The vine feemed to grow spontaneously in every valley.

valley, and offer its luxuriant produce to every hand. The industrious infect which spins the wonderful substance called filk out of its bowels, though lately introduced into that part of Alia, seemed to receive new vigour from the mildness of the climate. Corn and oil, the noblest fruits, and the most falubrious herbs, were found in the garden of every peafant; and the herds of cattle and horses, which wandered over our luxuriant pastures, equalled or surpassed all I had obferved in other countries. But this profusion of bleffings, instead of being attended with any beneficial effects, produced nothing but a foolish taste for frivolous employment and fenfuality. Feafts, and dances, and music, the tricks of players, and exhibitions of buffoons, were more attended to than all the ferious and important cares of life. Every young man was a critic in the science of adjusting the folds of his robe, or of giving a studied negligence to his hair; every young woman was instructed in every art that serves to consume time or endanger modesty. Repeat to them an idle tale, the tricks of a gamester, or the adventures of a singing girl, and every audience liftened with mute attention to the wonderful narration; but tellthem of the fituation of their country, the H 6. wretched wretched state of their civil and military discipline, or of the numerous and warlike tribes of barbarians which surround them, and every auditor would steal away in silence,

In such a state of things it was not long to be expected that my countrymen would be permitted to hold the riches they abused, and wanted firmness to defend. A warlike tribe of barbarians burst forth from the northern mountains of Asia, and spread themselves over our fertile plains, which they laid waste like a consuming tempest, After a few ineffectual skirmishes, which only ferved to expose their weakness to the contempt of their enemies, they yielded without opposition to the invader; in this, indeed, more wife than to irritate him by a fruitless resistance: and thus, in a few weeks, the leader of an obscure tribe of barbarians faw himself become a powerful monarch, and possession of one of the richest provinces of Afia.

I was fitting one evening at the door of my cottage, gazing upon the fading glory of the fetting iun, when a man of a majestic appearance, but with something ferocious in his look, attended by several others, past by. As he approached my little garden

he feemed to view it with fatisfaction, and to unbend the habitual sternness of his look: I asked him if he would enter in and taste the fruits with his companions. He accepted my offer; and, entering into a shady arbour, I brought him the most palatable fruits I could find, with milk and other rustic fare, such as my farm afforded. He feemed pleased with his entertainment, and when he was departing, thanked me with great affability, and bade me ask a favour in return; which, added he, with a certain degree of conscious pride, you can scarcely make too great either for my gratitude or power. If, answerered I, for I began to sufpect that it was Arfaces, the leader of these barbarians, your power is indeed equal to every boon, give peace and liberty to my country. The first, said he, I have already given; and, as to the fecond, it is impof-fible; their vices and effeminacy render them incapable of enjoying it. Men that have neither virtue, temperance, nor valour, can never want a mafter; even though Arfaces were to withdraw his conquering troops. But ask again, added he, something for thyfelf, and let the favour be worthy me to bestow. Heaven, answered I, with a smile, has already given every thing that that I can want, when it gave the earth fertility, and me the power to labour. All, therefore, that I request, O mighty con-queror, is, that you will please to order your men to step aside from the newly cultivated ground, and not destroy my vegetables. By heavens, said Arsaces, turning to his companions, there is something elevated in the tranquillity and composure of this man's mind; and, were I not Arsaces, I should have the composure of the control of t be with pleasure, Chares. He then departed, but ordered me to attend him the next day at the camp, and gave strict orders that none of the foldiers should molest me, or injure my humble residence.

I attended the great Arfaces at the time he had appointed, and traverfed the encampment of his troops with admiration and regret. This people was a tribe of that mighty empire which is called Scythia, whose inhabitants have so often issued from their deferts for the conquest and destruction of their neighbours. This country extends to an unknown length behind the most fertile districts of Europe and Asia. The climate is cold in winter, and the earth for several months covered with snow; but in summer it feels the enlivening influence of the fun, and for that reason is possessed of an amazing degree of fertility. But, as the inhabitants live remote from the fea, and possess few navigable rivers, they are little acquainted with agriculture or the arts of life. Instead of trusting to the increase of their fields for food, they raife prodigious herds of cattle and horses in the luxuriant pastures, which every where abound. The Scythians, like the Arabians, wander over these immense spaces without a fixed or permanent residence. By the side of lakes and rivers, where the verdure is more constant, and the vegetation stronger, they generally encamp, until the heats of the fummer compel them to ascend the mountains. and feek a cooler residence. Their houses are composed of flender poles covered with skins or a coarse cloth, and therefore easily erected, or taken down and stowed in waggons, for the convenience of transporting them in their marches. Their diet is answerable to the poverty of their habitations. They milk their herds, and above all, their mares, and preserve the produce in large bottles for months together. This four and homely mess is to them the greatest dainty, and composes the chief of their nourishment. To this they add the flesh of their cattle and horses, which they kill when afflicted afflicted with disease, but rarely in health. This is the fimple and uniform life of all the Scythians; but this simplicity renders them formidable to all their neighbours, and irrefiftible in war. Unfoftened by ease or luxury, unacquainted with the artificial wants of life, these nations pass their lives in manly exercises and rustic employments. But horsemanship is the greatest pride and passion of their souls: nor is there an individual who does not at least possess several of these noble animals. These, though fmall in fize, are admirably adapted for the fatigues of war and the chace, and endowed with incomparable swiftness. As to the Scythians themselves, they excel all other nations, unless it be the Arabs, in their courage and address in riding. Without a faddle, or even a bridle, their young men will vault upon an unbacked courfer, and keep their feats in spite of all his violent efforts, till they have rendered him tame and obedient to their will. In their military expeditions they neither regard the obstacles of nature, nor the inclemencies of the feafon, and their horses are accustomed to traverse rocks and mountains with a facility that is incredible. If they reach a river, instead of waiting for the tedious assistance of boats boats and bridges, the warrior divests himself of his cloaths and arms, which he places in a bundle upon his horse's back, and then, plunging into the stream, conducts him over by the bridle. Even in the midst of winter, when the hatred of other nations gives way to the inclemencies of the feafon, the Scythian follows his military labours; and rejoices to fee the earth thick covered with frost and snow, because it affords him a folid path to his excursions. Neither the feverest cold, nor the most violent storms, can check his ardour. Wrapt up in the thick furs of animals, the patient horseman purfues his march, while all his food for weeks together is comprized in a little bag of feeds or corn. Javelins, and bows and arrows, are the arms which this people are taught from their infancy to use with surprizing dexterity: and, no less dangerous when they fly than when they charge the enemy in front, they are accustomed to shoot with an unerring aim at their pursuers, and turn the fortune of the battle.

Such men are scarcely to be conquered by the efforts of the most powerful nations or sovereigns; and, therefore, the proudest conquerors of the world have failed in their attempts to subdue them. Darius, one of the greatest kings which the vast empire of Persia ever obeyed, once attempted the exploit, and had nearly perished in the attempt.

He advanced with a powerful army, but ill prepared for fuch an expedition, into the Scythian wastes. The inhabitants, well acquainted with the most effectual methods of defence, transported their families and herds into the interior parts of the country; and, mounting their fleetest horses, seemed to fly before the monarch. Infatuated with pride and confidence he purfued the chace for feveral days, until he found himself in the midst of solitary deserts, totally destitute of all that human wants require, where his army could neither advance nor retire, without equal danger of periffing by thirst and famine. When they saw him thus involved, the Scythian horsemen began to check their speed; instead of slying, as usual, they hemmed him in on every side, and harrassed the army with continual attacks. It was then they fent a present to the Persian king, whose mysterious meaning increased the terrors of his fituation. A Scythian, mounted upon a fiery steed, entered the camp at full speed, and, regardless of dan-ger or opposition, penetrated even to the royal royal tent, where Darius was holding a council with his nobles. While they were all amazed at this extraordinary boldness, the man leaped lightly from his horse, and, placing a little bundle upon the ground, vaulted up again with inconceivable agility, and retired with the same happy expedition. The curiofity of the monarch made him instantly order the packet to be examined, which contained only a mouse, a bird, a fish, and a bundle of arrows. Silence and aftonishment for forme time seized the affembly; till, at length, the king observed, that he thought the present which the Sey-thians had sent could signify nothing but their submission to his arms. The mouse, faid he, must represent the earth, because he resides in holes which he digs in the foil; the fish inhabits the waters, and the bird resides in air; by sending me, therefore, all these various animals, they mean to signify that they resign their air, their waters, and their earth, to my dominion: nor is the bundle of arrows more difficult to be explained: these constitute their principal defence, and, by fending them to an enemy, they can intimate nothing but terror and fubmission. bett of autoring liber

All who were present applauded this difcourse of the monarch, excepting Gobrias, a man of fingular wifdom and experience, who, when he was pressed to declare his sentiments, spoke to him thus: It is with the greatest reluctance, O king, that I find myself compelled to explain these presents of our enemies in a very different manner. That the Scythians, who have hitherto shewn no marks either of fear or submission, should, on a sudden, feel so great a terror of the Persian arms, I cannot easily believe: more especially when I consider, that our army is very much reduced by the diffress it has fuffered, and environed on every fide by the enemy, whose boldness visibly increases with our necessities. What, therefore, I should infer from this extraordinary present is this; they intimate that, unless, like the mouse, you can dig your passage through the earth, or skim the air like the bird, or glide through waters with the fish, you shall certainly perish by the Scythian arrows.

Such was the sentiment of Gobrias, and all the assembly was struck with the evident truth of his interpretation. The king himself began to perceive and repent his rashness; instead of advancing farther into deferts which afforded no subsistence, he refolved to attempt a retreat. This, however, he was not able to effect, without the loss of the greatest part of his troops, who perished by thirst and famine, and the continual attacks of the enemy.

Nor was the expedition of Lysimachus, another powerful king, against this people, less memorable or less unfortunate. His army was defeated, and he himself taken prisoner; but, instead of meeting with that cruelty which we are accustomed to expect from barbarians, he experienced the greatest moderation and humanity from his conquerors. The general of the Scythians invited his captive to a solemn sestival, in which he took care to affemble every circumstance of luxury and magnificence which prevails in polished nations. The most exquifite meats were ferved up to table, and the most generous wines sparkled in golden bowls of the exactest workmanship. Lysimachus was equally delighted with the ele-gance of the repalt and the politeness of the entertainer; but he was extremely surprized, that, instead of sharing in the feast, or even fitting down at table, the Scythian leader reposed in a corner of the tent, upon the bare ground, and fatisfied his hunger wirh with the most coarse and ordinary fare, pre--pared with all the simplicity of his country's manners. When the entertainment was finished, he asked Lysimachus which method of life appeared to him the most agree-able. Lysimachus could not conceal his preference of the more refined and luxurious dainties, or his dislike of the Scythian diet. If, therefore, replied his generous host, you feel so great a contempt for what this country produces, and fo strong a preference for the productions of your own, what but madness, O king, can have tempted you to come so far in order to subdue men that live in a manner you despite? Is it not much greater wisdom to be contented with those advantages which you prize fo highly, than to expose them to a certain hazard, for the chance of acquiring what would afford no pleasure or satisfaction? But let this lesson be sufficient to teach you moderation. A country which produces nothing but iron is not eafily conquered; nor are men, who have been from their infancy inured to every hardship, to be vanquished by curled and perfumed foldiers, who cannot live without baths, and music, and daily feasts. Be contented, therefore, for the futue, to number the Scythians among among your friends; and rather pray that the gods may keep them in ignorance of the fuperiority of your method of living, left a defire of tasting it should tempt them to defert their own country and invade yours. With this discourse he generously restored Lysimachus to liberty, and suffered him to lead back the shattered remains of his numerous army.

Such was the nation which had invaded Syria, and eafily triumphed over the efforts of an effeminate and unwarlike people. As I passed through the camp, I was assonished at the order and regularity which prevailed among these barbarians. Some were exercifing their horses in the mimic representation of a battle; part fled with incredible fpeed, while the rest pursued and darted blunted javelins at their antagonists. Yet even those who sled would frequently turn upon their pursuers, and make them repent their rashness. Some, while their horses were running in full fpeed, would vault from off their backs to others which accompanied them. Some would gallop by a mark erected for their arrows, and when they had passed it a considerable way, turn themselves round upon their horses and transfix it with an unerring aim. I faw many many who vaulted upon their horses, and placed themselves between two naked swords, which would have given them certain death, had they swerved ever so little from the just direction. In another part of the camp, I observed the children who imitated all the actions of their fathers, and bended little bows adapted to their ftrength, or guided horses of an inferior stature along the plain. Their women were indeed inferior to the Syrians in beauty and elegance, but seemed to be of a more robust constitution, and more adapted to produce and educate warriors.

I faw no gold, no jewels, no vain and coftly apparel; but all feemed bufy in domeffic cares, preparing the food of their families, or tending upon their infants. At length I reached the royal tent, which fearcely differed from the reft in its ftructure or fimplicity, and was immediately introduced to the great Arfaces. He received me with a courtefy which had nothing of the barbarian in it, feated me familiarly by his fide, and entered into a long conversation with me upon the laws and manners, and customs of the different nations I had feen. I was furprized at the vigour and penetration which I discovered in this untutored tored warrior's mind. Unbiassed by the mass of prejudices which we acquire in cities, even from our earliest childhood, unincumbered by forms and ceremonies which contract the understanding while they pretend to improve the manners, he seemed to possess a certain energy of soul which never missed the mark. Nature in him had produced the fame effects which study and philosophy do in others. But what amazed me more than all, was to find this Scythian chief as well acquainted with the state and consequences of our manners, as if he had passed his life in Greece or Syria, instead of the plains and forests of his own domain. He entertained a rooted contempt for all the arts, which foften the body and mind, under the pretence of adding to the ele-gancies of life; thefe, he faid, were more efficacious agents to reduce men to flavery, than the fwords and arrows of their enemies.

One day I remembered that force of our principal men, judging of the mind of their conqueror by their own, brought to him a celebrated dancer; who at that time, engaged the whole attention of our city, and feemed to interest it much more than the loss of liberty. This man, who did not Vot. III.

doubt that he should enchant the soul of a Scythian barbarian, by the same arts which had enraptured his refined audiences at home, exerted himself with an agility that extorted the loudest applause from all the spectators but Arsaces. At length, one of our countrymen took the liberty of asking the monarch, what he thought of this extraordinary performance; I think, replied he, coldly, that it would gain him great credit in a nation of monkies.

Another time, he was present at the exhibitions of a celebrated musician, who was reputed to poffess unrivalled skill in playing foft and melting tunes upon the lyre. All the audience seemed to feel the influence of his art, by their inarticulate murmurs of admiration, and the languishing postures of their bodies. When the exhibition was finished, the musician advanced, amid the united plaudits of the audience, as if to receive the just tribute of approbation from Arfaces. But he, with a stern look, said to him, Friend, I permit thee to play every night before the Syrians; but, if thy lyre is ever heard to found in the presence of my Scythians, I denounce certain death for the offence. morn

Another

Another time, an officious glutton of our city introduced to him, with great folemnity, two men, whose talents he affured him were unequalled in their different professions. The one, he said, adjusted hair with such dexterity, that he could give an with such dexterity, that he could give an artificial beauty to every countenance; and the other possessed fuch unrivalled skill in cooking a repast, that even the soberest guest was tempted to commit intemperance. My soldiers, replied Artaces, are accustomed to adjust their locks with the points of their arrows; nor does our nation consider a bloated paunch and an unwieldy shape, as any accomplishment in warriors; all, therefore, that I can do for these gentlemen, is, to depute one of them to comb my horse's tail, and the other to feed the hogs of the army.

my horse's tail, and the other to feed the hogs of the army.

After I had conversed some time with this barbarian chies, who heard me with the greatest attention, the hour of refreshment for the army approached, and I was preparing to retire; but the general stopped me, with a sinile, and told me I had already entertained him with the greatest hopitality, and that therefore it was just that I should stay and taste the Scythian food. A bit of dried sieh, which I asterwards I 2 found found was that of an horse, some sour, coagulated milk, with an infusion of certain herbs, thickened with a coarse kind of flour, were then brought in, and placed upon the ground. I had learned, during my travels in different countries, to different the false in different countries, to discard the false antipathies which so many nations entertain against the diet as well as manners of each other. Whatever is adapted to support life is proper for the food of man; habit will reconcile us to every kind of food, and he that can accustom himself to be the most easily contented is happiest, and best prepared for performing the duties of life. I therefore placed myself by the side of Arsaees, and fed without any visible repugnance upon a diet, which would have excited abhorence in the minds of all my countrymen. horrence in the minds of all my countrymen. With them it was a work of the greatest importance to fettle the formalities of a meal. To contrive a new and poignant fauce, to combine contrary flavours in a pickle, to stimulate the jaded appetite to new exertions, till reason and every thing human sunk under the undigested mass of food, were reckoned the highest efforts of genius. Even the magistrate did not blush to display a greater knowledge of cookery than the laws; the debates of the senate itself were often sufpended pended by the fear of losing a repast; and many of our generals prided themselves more upon the arrangement of their tables, than the martial evolutions of their troops.

After we had eaten some time, Arfaces After we had eaten some time, Arraces asked me what I thought of the Scychian method of living. To speak my sentiments, said I, it is more formidable to your enemies, than agreeable to your friends. He smiled at my sincerity, and I departed; but from this hour he distinguished me with marks of peculiar favour, and admitted me to all his counsels. This enviet mark of distinctions counsels. To she placefore the particular favour and a counsels. tinction gave me no other pleasure than as it fometimes enabled me to be useful to my unfometimes enabled me to be useful to my unhappy countrymen, and mitigate the rigour of their conquerors. Indeed, while the great Arsaces lived, his love of justice and order were so great, that even the conquered were safe from all oppression. The peasant pursued his useful labours, unterristed by the march of armies, or unsolicited brought the produce of his fields to a voluntary market. Merchants from all the neighbouring nations crowded to our ports, attracted by the order and justice which were enforced in every part of Arsaces' dominions: and even the vanguished themselves, defended from oppression and protected in their possessions, confidered the success of the Scythians rather as a falutary revolution than as a barbarian conquest.

Such was the pleasing prospect of affairs, when an unexpected disease, the consequence of unremitting exertions, put an end to the glorious life of our conqueror; and with him perished all hopes of safety or happiness to the Syrians. His authority alone was capatle of restraining so many needy chiestains, fo many victorious barbarians: the spirit of rapine and plunder, fo long represt, began now to spread through all the army. Every officer was an independent tyrant, that ruled with despotic authority, and punished as rebellion the least opposition to his will. The fields were now ravaged, the cities plundered, the industrious peasants driven away like herds of cattle, to labour for the caprice of unfeeling masters, or fold in distant regions as slaves. Now it was that the miserable and harassed Syrians began to find, that the riches which they so much esteemed, were but the causes of their ruin, instead of being instrumental to their safety. The poor, accustomed to hardship, have little to fear amid the vicissitudes of life; the brave can always find a refuge in their own valour: but all the bitterness of existence is reserved for those, that have neither courage to defend what they most value, nor fortitude to bear the lofs.

To increase the weight of our missortunes, new tribes of barbarians, attracted by the fuccess of their countrymen, issued from their deferts, and haftened to share the spoil. But rapine admits not faith or partnership; and it was not long before the vanquished beheld their conquerors animated by implacable rage against each other, and fuffering in turn the violence and cruelties they had inflicted.

At length, one of the principal officers of Arfaces, who is faid originally to have descended from the mountains which you inhabit, was raised to empire by the successful efforts of his soldiers. He had already attacked and destroyed all his competitors, and assembled under his banners the remainder of their forces. Tigranes, for thus he is named, possesses all the courage and activity of Arfaces, but he is destitute of his generofity and clemency. His ambi-tion is vast and boundless; he grasps at universal empire, and rejoices to scatter ruin and destruction in his way. He has already subjected all the maritime cities that derive their origin from Greece, together with the fertile:

fertile plains of Syria. These mountains, inhabited by a bold and hardy race of men, now present a barrier to his enterprizing spirit, and I am affored he already meditates the conquest. His foldiers are drawn together from every part; they swarm like ravening wolves along the fields, and no-thing can escape their fury. In vain did I think myself safe in the humble obscurity of my cottage, and the reputed favour of the great Artaces. Yesterday, a lawless band, not contented with destroying my harvest and plundering my little property, seized my daughter and me, and dragged us away in chains. What farther injuries, what farther infults we might have fuffered, it is impossible to determine; since Heaven was pleased to effect our deliverance when we had least reason to expect it.

Such was the history of Chares, which Sophron and his family listened to with fixed attention. When he had finished, the father of Sophron again embraced the venerable stranger, and affured him of all the safety which their mountains could bestow. But, added he, if so imminent a danger is near, it behoves us to consult for the general safety; let us affemble all our friends friends and neighbours, that they may consider whether life is of more consequence than liberty; and, if they determine to re-tain that freedom which they have received from their ancestors, by what means it may be best defended. Sophron then immediately went on, and afcending a neighbouring rock, thus shouted out in a voice which echoed over the neighbouring vallies; Arm, O ye inhabitants of Lebanon, and instantly meet in council, for a powerful invader is near, and threatens you with death or flavery. This found was instantly repeated by all who heard it, so that in a short time the intelligence was dispersed to the very confines of the country.

It was not long before a numerous af-fembly was convened. The aged appeared with all the majestic dignity of wisdom and experience; their countenances, indeed, indicated the ravages of time, but tem-perance and exercise had preserved them from the loathsome diseases which grow on luxury and incolence. They were attended by their fons in all the pride of youth and vigour, who rushed along in arms, and seemed to breathe deliberate rage and unconquerable opposition. When they were all assembled upon a spacious plain, Sophron rose, and, with a becoming modesty, recited the adventures of the preceding night, and the alarming intelligence he had just received. He had scarcely finished before a general cry of indignation burst unanimously from the whole assembly. When it had a little subsided, a venerable old man, whose heard, which as the form were the whose beard, white as the snow upon the fummits of the mountains, reached down to his middle, slowly arose, and leaning upon his staff, spoke thus: Ninety years have I tended my slocks amid these mountains. tains, and during all that time I have never feen an human being who was bold enough to propose to the inhabitants of Lebanon, that they should fear death more than infamy, or submit to be the vassals of a ty-rant. At this a second cry, which seemed tant. At this a second cry, which seemed to rend the very heavens, was raised, and farther deliberation judged unnecessary, except upon the most effectual means of defence. For this purpose, the aged and more experienced retired to a little distance to consult. They were not long in their deliberations; it was unanimously agreed, that all who were able to bear arms should be embodied, and wait for the approach of the enemy within the boundaries of their own mountains. The nature of the country, always rough, and in many parts inaccessible, would afford them, they thought, fufficient advantages even against the more numerous and better disciplined troops of the invader: and, by the common consent of all, Sophron was named the general of his country, and invested with supreme authority for its defence. When these measures had been resolved upon, the assembly disperfed, and Sophron was left alone with Chares. It was then the stranger thus accosted him, with a deep sigh: Did success, O virtuous Sophron, depend entirely upon-the justice of the cause, or upon the courage and zeal of its defenders, I should have little doubt concerning the event of the present contest. For, I can truly say, that in all the various countries I have visited, my eyes have never feen a more martial race. than I have this day beheld affembled: nor can I doubt that their fentiments correspond to their appearance. All, therefore, that can be effected by patience, activity, and dauntless courage, will be atchieved by your countrymen in defence of their liberty. But war, unfortunately, is a trade, where long experience frequently confers advantages, which no intrepidity can balance. The troops, which are now approaching, have been been for years inured to the practice of flaughter; they join to a courage which defies every danger, a knowledge of every fraud and fubtlety which can confound or baffle an adverfary. In bodily strength, in numbers, your countrymen are superior; even in courage, and the contempt of danger, they are probably not inserior to their enemies: but such are the satal effects of military skill and discipline, that I dread the event of a combat with such an army and such a leader.

Alas! answered Sophron, how well do the mature reflections of your wisdom accord with my presaging sears! I know that my countrymen will perform every thing that can be effected by men in their situation; and that thousands will generously sacrifice their lives rather than abandon the cause they have undertaken to defend: yet, when I consider the superior advantages of our enemies, my sears are no less active than your own. This consolation, however, remains, that I shall either see my country victorious, or avoid the miseries which will attend her ruin.

Hear me, then, replied Chares.—The virtues of your friends, my own obligations to yourfelf, and the defire I feel to oppose the career of mad ambition, conspire to wrest from me a dreadful secret, which I have hitherto buried in my own bosom, and had determined to conceal from the knowledge of mankind. I have already told you that much of my life has been dedicated to the acquisition of knowledge, and the investigation of the laws of nature. Not contented with viewing the appearances of things, as they strike our senses, I have endeavoured to penetrate into the deeper recesses of nature, and to discover those secrets which are concealed from the greater part of mankind. For this purpose, I have tried innumerable experiments concerning the manner in which bodies act upon each other; I have submitted the plants, the stones, the minerals, which surround us, to the violence of all-confuming fires; I have examined their structure, and the different principles which compose them, with the patient labour and perseverance of a long life. In the course of these inquiries, I have made many curious and important discoveries, but one above the rest, which I will now impart, under the promise of eternal and inviolable fecrecy. Know, then, that I have found out an easy and expeditious combination of common materials, the effect of which is equal or superior to the most potent and destructive agents in nature. Neither the proudest city can maintain its walls, or the strongest castle its bulwarks, against the irresistible attacks of this extraordinary composition. Increase but the quantity, and the very rocks and mountains will be torn assumed, with a violence that equals that of earthquakes. Whole armies, proud of their triumphs, may be in an instant scattered and destroyed, like the summer's dust before the whirlwind: and, what increases the prodigy, a fingle man may securely give death to thousands.

—This composition I have hitherto conceased, in pity to the miseries of mankind; but, since there appears no other method of preserving the virtuous inhabitants of these mountains from flavery and ruin, I am determined to employ it in their defence. Give orders, therefore, that a certain number of your countrymen provide me with the ingredients that I shall indicate, and expect the amplest success from your own valour, affished by such powerful auxiliares.

Sophron said every thing to Chares which such an unexpected mark of considence deferved, and instantly received his orders, and prepared to execute them with the greatest alacrity. Chares, mean-while, was indefatigable in the execution of his project, and it was not long before he had pre-pared a sufficient quantity to provide for the common defence. Tigranes now approached with the rage and confidence of a lion that invades a flock of domestic animals. had long forgotten all the ties which attach men to the place of their birth, and neither time, nor distance, had been able to extinguish the hatred he had conceived to Sophron. Scarcely did he deign to fend an ambassador before his army. He, however, dispatched one with an imperious message, requiring all the inhabitants of Lebanon to submit to his victorious arms, or threatening them with the worst extremities of war. When the ambaffador returned, and reported the fixed determination of Sophron and his countrymen, he was inflamed with rage, and ordered his army to advance to the attack. They marched without opposition till they entered the mountainous districts, where all the bravest inhabitants were ranged in arms to meet the invader. Then arose the noise of war and the clang of arms; then man encountered man, and wounds and death were feen on every side. The troops of Tigranes advanced in close array, with with long protended spears; the inhabitants of Lebanon were lighter armed, and, with invincible courage, endeavoured to break the formidable battalion of their enemies. They rushed with fury upon the dreadful range of weapons, and, even wounded and dying, endeavoured to beat down their points, and open a way to their companions. Sophron was seen conspicuous in every part of the field, encouraging his companions with his voice, and more by his actions. Wherever he turned his steps, he was followed by the bravest youth of his party, and there the efforts and the slaughter were always greatest. Five times, covered with blood and dust, he made a desperate charge upon the troops of Tigranes, and five times did he force his bravest soldiers to give ground. At length, the superiority of discipline and experience began to prevail over the generous, but more unequal efforts of the defenders. The veterans of Tigranes perceived their advantage, and pressed the enemy with redoubled vigour. This was the decifive moment which Chares had forefeen and provided for: in an instant the bands of Lebanon retreat by the orders of Sophron, with a precipitation bordering upon flight. Tigranes, supposing himself cer-certain of victory, orders his troops to advance and decide the fortune of the battle; but, while they are rashly preparing to obey, a sudden noise is heard that equals the loudest thunders; the earth itself trembles with a convultive motion under their feet; then bursts afunder with a violence that nothing can refift. Hundreds are in an instant swallowed up, or dashed against rocks, and miserably destroyed. Meanwhile, all nature feems to be convulfed around; the rocks themselves are torn from their folid base, and with their enormous fragments crush whole bands of miserable wretches beneath. Clouds of fmoke obscure the field of battle, and veil the combatants in a dreadful shade; which is, from time to time, dispelled by slashes of de-structive fire. Such a succession of horrors daunted even the most brave: scarcely could the troops of Lebanon, who had been prepared to expect some extraordinary inter-position, maintain their post, or behold the spectacle of their enemies ruin; but the bands of Tigranes were struck with the wildest consternation, and sled with trembling steps over the field. And now these prodigies were succeeded by an awful interval of quiet; the peals of burfting thunder were were no longer heard, the lightnings ceased to flash, the mists that darkened the scene were rolled away, and discovered the various fortunes of the fight. Then the voice of Sophron was heard, exhorting his companions to pursue the fugitives and complete their victory. They rushed forwards like angry lions to the chace; but all refiftance was at an end: and Sophron, who now perceived that the enemy was irretrievably broken, checked the ardour of his men, and intreated them to spare the vanquished. They obeyed his voice, and, after having chaced them beyond the utmost boundaries of Lebanon, returned in triumph, amid the praises and acclamations of their joyful families, whom they had preserved from flavery by their valour. They then examined the field of battle, and, collecting all who had any remains of life, they treated them with the greatest humanity, binding up their wounds, and administering to all their necessities. Among the thickest dead was found the breathless body of Tigranes, miserably shattered and disfigured, but still exhibiting evident marks of passion and ferocity. Sophron could not behold, without compassion, the friend of his early years, and the companion of his youthful sports. Un-

Unhappy man! faid he, thou haft, at length, paid the price of thy ungovernable ambition! How much better would it have been to have tended thy flocks upon the mountains, than to have blazed an angry meteor, and fet for ever amid the curses of thy country! He then covered the body with a military vest, and ordered it to be honourably burned upon a mighty funeral pile which was prepared for all the dead.

meteor, and let for ever amid the curles of thy country! He then covered the body with a military veft, and ordered it to be honourably burned upon a mighty funeral pile which was prepared for all the dead.

The next day, an immense quantity of spoil was collected that had been abandoned by the troops of Tigranes in their flight. The simple inhabitants of Lebanon, the greater part of whom had never been beyond the limits of their mountains were yond the limits of their mountains, were yond the limits of their mountains, were aftonished at such a display of luxury and magnificence. Already the secret possion of sensuality and avarice began to enslame their hearts, as they gazed on costly hangings, enriched with gold and silver, on Persian carpets, and drinking vessels of the most exquisite workmanship. Already had they begun to differ about the division of these splendid trisles, when Sophorn, who marked the growing mischief, and remembered the statl effects which Chares had described in his travels, rose, and proposed to his counhis travels, rose, and proposed to his countrymen, that the arms of their conquered enemies enemies should be carefully preserved for the public defence, but that all the rest of the spoil should be consumed upon the superior for the spoil should be consumed upon the superior for the dead, lest the simplicity of the inhabitants of Lebanon should be corrupted, and the happy equality and union which had hitherto prevailed among them interrupted. This proposal was instantly applauded by all the older and wifer part of the assembly, who rejoiced in seeing the evils averted which they had so much reason to apprehend: nor did those of a different character dare to express their sentiments, or attempt any open opposition.

From this time, Sophron was univerfally honoured by all as the most virtuous and valiant of his nation. He passed the rest of his life in peace and tranquillity, contented with the exercise of the same rural employments which had engaged his child-hood. Chares, whose virtues and knowledge were equally admirable, was presented, at the public expence, with a small but fertile tract of land, sufficient to supply him with all the comforts of life; this the grateful inhabitants of the mountains continually cultivated for him, as a memorial of the signal assistance he had afforded them; and here, here, contented with the enjoyment of fe-curity and freedom, he passed the remaining part of his life in the contemplation of nature, and the delightful intercourse of vir-tuous friendship.

When Miss Simmons had finished, Tommy expressed his assonishment at the latter part of the story. Is it possible, said he, there can be any thing of so extraordinary a nature as to burst the very rocks assumer, and destroy an army at once?—Have you, then, never heard the explosion of a gun, or are you ignorant of the destrustive effects of the powder with which they charge it? faid Mr. Barlow.

Томму.

Yes, fir; but that is nothing to what Chares did in the story.

Mr. BARLOW.

That is only because it is used in very inconsiderable portions; but, were you to increase the quantity, it would be capable of effecting every thing which you heard Miss Simmons describe. When nations are at war with each other, it is now univerfally the agent of destruction. They have large tubes of iron, called cannons, otni even inough as is poor, than it, a into which they ram a confiderable quantity of powder, together with a large iron ball, as big as you are able to lift. They then fet fire to the powder, which explodes with fo much violence, that the ball flies out and destroys, not only every living thing it meets with, but even demolishes the strongest walls that can be raised. Sometimes it is buried in confiderable quantities in the earth, and then they contrive to en-flame it, and to escape in time. When the fire communicates with the mass, it is all enflamed in an instant, and produces the horrible effects you have heard described. As fuch are the irrefiftible effects of gunpowder, it is no wonder that even a victo-rious army should be stopped in their progress by such a dreadful and unexpected event.

TOMMY.

That is true, indeed; and I declare Chares was a very good and fensible man. Had it not been for him, these brave inhabitants of Lebanon must have been ensured. I now plainly perceive, that a man may be of much more consequence by improving his mind in various kinds of knowledge, even though he is poor, than by all the finery and magnificence he can acquire. I wish, with all my heart, that Mr. Barlow had been so good as to read this story to the young gentlemen and ladies that were lately here. I think it would have made a great impression upon their minds, and would have prevented their feeling so much contempt for poor Harry, who is better and wiser than them all, though he does not powder his hair, or dress so genteelly.

Tommy, said Mr. Merton, with a kind

Tommy, faid Mr. Merton, with a kind of contemptuous smile, why should you believe that the hearing of a single story would change the characters of all your late friends, when neither the good instructions you have been so long receiving from Mr. Barlow, nor the intimacy you have had with Harry, were sufficient to restrain your impetuous temper, or prevent you from treating him in the shameful manner you have done?

Tommy appeared very much abashed with his sather's rebuke; he hung down his head in silence a considerable time: at length he faintly said; Oh, sir! I have, indeed, acted very ill: I have rendered myself unworthy of the affection of all my best friends. But do not, pray, do not give me up entirely; you shall see how I will behaved behave for the future; and if ever I am guilty of the same faults again, I consent that you should abandon me for ever. Saying this, he filently stole out of the room, as if intent upon some extraordinary reso-His father observed his motions, and, fmiling, faid to Mr. Barlow, What can this protend? This boy is changeable as a weathercock. Every blast whirls him round and round upon his centre, nor will he ever fix, I fear, in any direction. least, said Mr. Barlow, you have the greatest reason to rejoice in his present impressions, which are good and estimable. And, I fear, it is the lot of most human beings to exhaust almost every species of error before they fix in truth and virtue.

Tommy now entered the room, but with a remarkable change in his dress and manmer. He had combed the powder out of his hair, and demolished the elegance of his curls; he had divested his dress of every appearance of finery, and even his massy and ponderous buckles, so long the delight of his heart; and the wonder of his female friends, were taken from his shoes, and replaced by a pair of the plainest form and appearance. In this habiliment he appeared so totally changed from what he was, that that even his mother, who had lately become a little fparing of her observations, could not help exclaiming, What, in the name of wonder, has the boy been doing now! Why, Tommy, I protest you have made yourself a perfect fright, and you look more like a ploughboy than a young gentleman!

Mamma, answered Tommy gravely, I am only now what I ought always to have been. Had I been contented with this dress before, I never should have imitated such a parcel of coxcombs as you have lately had at your house; nor pretended to admire Mis Matilda's music, which, I own, tired me as much as Harry, and had almost set me asseep; nor should I have exposed mysfelf at the play and the ball; and, what is worst of all, I should have avoided all my shameful behaviour to Harry at the bullbaiting. But, from this time, I shall apply myself to the study of nothing but reason and philosophy; and therefore I have bid adieu to dress and finery for ever.

It was with great difficulty that the gentlemen could refrain from laughing at Tommy's harangue, delivered with infinite feriousness and solemnity; they, however, concealed their emotions, and encouraged him to perfevere in such a laudable resolution. But, as the night was now pretty far advanced, the whole family retired to bed.

The next morning, early, Tommy arose and dressed himself with his newly adopted simplicity; and, as soon as breakfast was over, intreated Mr. Barlow to accompany him to Harry Sandford's. But he did not forget to take with him the lamb, which he had careffed and fed with constant affiduity ever fince he had fo valiantly refcued him from his devouring enemy. As they ap-proached the house, the first object which Tommy distinguished was his little friend at some distance, who was driving his father's sheep along the common. At this fight, his impetuosity could no longer be restrained, and, springing forward with all his speed, he arrived in an instant, panting, and out of breath, and incapable of speaking. Harry, who knew his friend, and plainly perceived the dispositions with which he approached, met him with open arms; fo that the reconciliation was begun and completed in a moment; and Mr. Barlow, who now arrived witth the lamb, had the pleasure of seeing his little pupils mutually giving and receiving every unaffected mark of the warmest affection.

Harry

Harry, faid Mr. Barlow, I bring you a little friend, who is fincerely penitent for his offences, and comes to own the faults he has committed. That I am indeed, faid Tommy, a little recovered and able to speak. But I have behaved so ill, and have been such an ungrateful fellow, that I am afraid Harry will never be able to forgive me. Indeed, indeed, said Harry, there you do me the greatest injustice; for I have already forgotten every thing but your former kindnels and affection. And I, answered Tommy, will never forget how ill, how ungratefully I have used you, nor the goodness with which you now receive me. Tommy then recollected his lamb, and presented it to his friend; while Mr. Barlow told him the story of its rescue, and the heroism exerted in its defence. Harry feemed to receive equal pleafure from the restoration of his favourite, and the affection Tommy had shewn in its preservation, and, taking him by the hand, he led him into a finall but neat and convenient house, where he was most cordially welcomed by Harry's family. In a corner of the chimney fat the honest black who had performed so fignal a service at the bull-baiting. Alas! faid Tonamy, there is another instance of my K 2 negligence and ingratitude. I now see that one fault brings on another without end. Then, advancing to the black, he took him kindly by the hand, and thanked him for the preservation of his life. Little master, replied he, you are extremely welcome to all I have done. I would at any time risque my own safety, to preserve one of my sellow-creatures; and, if I have been of any use, I have been amply repaid by the kindness of this little boy, your friend, and all his worthy samily. That is not enough, said Tommy, and you shall soon find what it is to oblige a person like Here a stroke of presumption was just coming out of Tommy's mouth, but, recollecting himself, he added, a person like my father. And now he addressed himself to Harry's mother, a venerable decent woman, of a mother, a venerable decent woman, of a middle age, and his two fifters, plain, modest, healthy-looking girls, a little older than their brother. All these he treated with so much cordiality and attention, that all the company were delighted with him; so easy is it for those who possess rank and fortune to gain the good-will of their selbow-creatures; and so inexcusable is that surly pride which renders many of them deservedly odious.

When dinner was ready, he fat down with the rest, and as it was the custom here for every body to wait upon himself, Tommy insisted upon their suffering him to conform to the established method. The victuals were not indeed very delicate, but the food was wholesome, clean, and served up hot to table; an advantage which is not always found in elegant apartments. Tommy are with a confiderable appetite, and feemed to enjoy his new fituation as much as if he had never experienced any other. After the dinner was removed, he thought he might with propriety gratify the curiofity he felt to converse with the black upon fighting bulls, for nothing had more aftonihed him than the account he had heard of his courage, and the ease with which he had subdued so terrible an animal. My friend, faid he, I fuppose in your own country you have been very much used to bull-baitings; otherwise you never would have dared to encounter such a fierce creature; I must consess, though I can tame most animals, I never was more frighted in my life, than when I saw him break loose; and without your affiftance, I do not know what would have become of me.

Master.

Master, replied the black, it is not in my own country, that I have learned to manage these animals. There I have been accustomed to several kinds of hunting, much more dangerous than this; and considering, how much you white people despise us blacks, I own I was very much surprized to see so many hundreds of you running away from fuch an infignificant enemy as a poor tame bull.

Tommy bluffed a little at the remembrance of the prejudices he had formerly entertained, concerning blacks and his own fuperiority; but not choofing now to enter upon the fubject, he asked the man where then he had acquired so much dexterity in taming them.

I will tell you, master, replied the black:
When I lived a slave among the Spaniards at Buenos Ayres, it used to be a common employment of the people to go into the woods and hunt cattle down for their subsistence. The hunter mounts his fleetest horse, and takes with him a strong cord of a considerable length: when he fees one of the wild kine, which he destines for his prey, he purfues it at full speed, and never fails to overtake it by the superior swiftness of his horse. While

While he is thus employed, he holds the cord ready, at the end of which a fliding noofe is formed; and when he is at a convenient distance, throws it from him with fuch a certain hand, that the beast is entangled by one of his legs, after which it is impossible for him to escape.

That you may form the clearer idea of what a man is capable of executing, with courage and address, I will relate a most extraordinary incident to which I was witness, during my residence in that part of the world. A certain man, a native of the country, had committed fome offence, for which he was condemned to labour several years in the gallies. He found means to speak to the governor of the town, and befought him to change the nature of his punishment. I have been brought up, said he, a warrior, and fear dishonour, but not death. Instead of confuming my strength and spirits in such an ignominious employment, let me have an opportunity of atchieving fomething worthy to be beheld, or of perishing like a brave man in the attempt. In a few days a folemn feast is to be celebrated, at which you will not fail to be present, attended by all your people. I will there, in the prefence of the whole city, encounter the fiercest bull you can procure. I desire no assistance but my horse, no weapons but this cord; yet thus prepared I will meet his fury, and take him by the head, the horns, the feet, as you shall direct. I will then throw him down, bridle him, faddle him, and vault upon his back; in this fituation, you shall turn out two more of the fiercest bulls you can find, and I will attack them both, and put them all to death with my dagger, the instant you shall command. The governor consented to this brave man's request, more from curiofity to fee fo extraordinary a spectacle, than from the opinion it would be attended with fuccess. When the appointed day arrived, the inhabitants of all the city affembled, and took their feats in a vast building which furrounded a confiderable open space, destined for this amazing combat. The brave American then appeared alone on horseback, armed with nothing but his cord; and, after riding round the place, and faluting the company, he waited intrepidly for his enemy. Prefently, an enormous bull was let loofe, who, as foon as he beheld the man, attacked him with all his fury. The American avoided his shock with infinite dexterity, and gallopped round the bull, who,

who, in his turn, betook himself to slight. The valiant horseman pursued his flying enemy, and, while he was thus engaged, defired the governor to direct where he would have him feized. He replied, it was a matter of indifference to him; and the American inftantly throwing his noofe, which he held ready all the time, caught the bull in his flight by one of his hinder legs; then gallopping two or three times round the animal, he so inveloped him in the snare, that, after a few violent efforts to disengage himself, he fell to the earth. He then leaped lightly from his horse, and the animal, who had been perfectly trained up to this kind of combat, stood still and kept the cord extended; while his mafter advanced to the bull, and put him to death in an instant, by stabbing him with his dagger behind the horns. All the affembly uttered a shout of admiration, but the conqueror told them that what they had feen was nothing, and, disentangling his cord from the flaughtered beaft, he composedly mounted his horse, and waited for a new and more formidable enemy. Presently, the gate of the torillo was opened, and a bull, much more furious than the last, rushed out, Kς whom whom he was ordered to bridle and faddle, according to his engagement.

I proteft, faid Tommy, this is the most wonderful story I ever heard. I do not believe all the fine gentlemen I have ever seen, put together, would dare to attack such a bull.

Master, replied the black, the talents of mankind are various, and nature has, in every country, furnished the human species with all the qualities necessary for their prefervation. In this country, and many others which I have seen, there are thousands who live like birds in cages upon the food provided by others, without doing any thing for themselves. But they should be contented with the happiness they enjoy, if such a life can be called happiness, and not despite their fellow-creatures, without whose continual assistance they could not exist an instant.

Very true, indeed, answered Tommy. You feem to me a very honest, sensible man, though a negro; and, since I have given myself up to the improvement of my mind, I entertain the same opinions. But, let us hear how this brave man succeeded in his next attempt.

When

When the champion perceived this fecond enemy approach, he waited for him with the same intrepidity he had discovered before, and avoided his formidable shock by making his horse wheel nimbly round the bull. When he had thus baffled his fury, and put his enemy to flight, he chaced him fome time as he had done the former, till he drove him near to the middle of the enclosed space, where a strong post had been firmly fixed into the ground. As soon as he approached this spot, he threw the unerring noose, and, catching the bull by the horns, entangled him as he had done before, and dragged him with fome difficulty to the stake. To this he bound him down fo closely that it became impossible for the creature either to resist or stir. Leaping then from his horse, who remained immoveable as before, he took a faddle, which had been left there on purpose, and girded it firmly upon the back of the bull; through his nostrils he thrust an iron ring, to which was fixed a cord which he brought over his neck as a bridle; and then, arming his hand with a short pike, he nimbly vaulted upon the back of this new and terrible courfer.

The creature all this time did not cease to bellow with every expression of rage, which had not the least effect upon the mind which had not the least effect upon the mind of this valiant man. On the contrary, coolly taking a knife, he cut the cord which bound him to the stake, and restored him to perfect liberty. The creature, thus disengaged, exerted every effort of strength and sury to throw his rider, who kept his seat undaunted in spite of all his violent agitations. The gates of the torillo were then thrown open, and two other surious bulls rushed out, and seemed ready to attack the man: but, the instant they perceived the manner in which he was mounted, their rage gave way to terror, and they see their rage gave way to terror, and they fled precipitately away. The other bull fol-lowed his companions, and bore his rider feveral times round the amphitheatre in this extraordinary chace. This spectacle had already lasted some time, to the admiration of all present, when the governor ordered the man to complete the business by putting all the bulls to death. He, in-ftantly drawing his knife, plunged it behind the horns of the bull on which he rode, who immediately dropped down dead, while the conqueror, difengaging himself as he fell, stood upright by the slaughtered animal. He then mounted his horse again, who had been placed in fafety at fome little diftance, and purfuing the chace as before, with his fatal noofe, dispatched both the furviving animals without the least difficulty.

Tommy expressed the greatest admiraeion at this recital; and now, as the evening began to advance, Mr. Barlow invited him to return. But Tommy, instead of complying, took him by the hand, thanked him for all his kindness and attention, but declared his refolution of flaying fome time with his friend Harry. The more I confider my own behaviour, faid he, the more I feel myfelf ashamed of my folly and ingratitude. But you have taught me, my dear fir, that all I have in my power is to acknowledge them, which I most willingly do before all this good family, and intreat Harry to think that the impressions I now feel are such as I shall never forget. Harry embraced his friend, and affured him once more of his being perfectly reconciled; and all the family stood mute with admiration at the condescension of the young gentleman, who was not ashamed of acknowledging his faults even to his inferiors.

Mr. Barlow approved of Tommy's defign, and took upon him to answer for the consent of Mr. Merton to his staying some time with Harry; then, taking his leave of all the company, he departed.

But Tommy began now to enter upon a course of life which was very little confistent with his former habits. He supped with great chearfulness, and even found himself happy with the rustic fare which was fet before him, accompanied as it was with unaffected civility and an hearty welcome. He went to bed early and flept very found all night; however, when Harry came to call him the next morning at five, as he had made him promise to do, he found a confiderable difficulty in rouzing himself at the fummons. Conscious pride, however, and the newly-acquired dignity of his character, supported him; he recollected that he should disgrace himself in the eyes of his father, of Mr. Barlow, and of all the family with which he now was, if he appeared incapable of acting up to his own declarations: he therefore made a noble effort, leaped out of bed, dreffed himfelf, and followed Harry. Not contented with this, he accompanied him in all his ruftic employments, and, as no kind of country exercise was entirely new to him since his residence with Mr. Barlow, he acquitted himfelf himself with a degree of dexterity which gained him new commendations.

Thus did he pass the first day of his visit, with some little difficulty indeed, but without deviating from his resolution. The second, he found his change of life infigure nitely more tolerable; and, in a very little space of time, he was almost reconciled to his new situation. The additional exercise he used improved his health and strength, and added so considerably to his appetite, that he began to think the table of farmer Sandsord exceeded all he had ever tried before.

By thus practifing the common useful occupations of life, he began to feel a more tender interest in the common concerns of his fellow-creatures of He now found, from his own experience, that Mr. Barlow had not deceived him in the various representations he had made of the utility of the lower classes, and consequently of the humanity which is due to them when they discharge their duty. Nor did that gentleman abandon his little friend in this important trial. He visited him frequently, pointed out every thing that was curious or interesting about the farm, and encouraged him to persevere by his praises. You are now, faid Mr. Barlow, one day, beginning to practife those virtues which have rendered the great men of other times fo justly famous. It is not by floth, nor finery, nor the mean indulgence of our appetites, that greatness of character, or even reputation, is to be acquired. He that would excel others in virtue or knowledge, must first excel them in temperance and application. You cannot imagine that men fit to command an army, or to give laws to a state, were ever formed by an idle and effeminate education: When the Roman people, oppressed by their enemies, were looking out for a leader able to defend them, and change the fortune of the war, where did they feek for this extraordinary man? It was neither at banquets, nor in splendid palaces, nor amid the gay, the elegant, or the diffipated; they turned their steps towards a poor and solitary cottage, such as the meanest of your late companions would consider with contempt; there they found Cincinnatus, whose virtues and abilities were allowed to excel all the rest of his citizens, turning up the foil with a pair of oxen, and holding the plough himself. This great man had been inured to arms and the management of public affairs, even from his infancy; he had repeatedly led the Roman legions to victory; yet in the hour of peace, or when his country did not require his fervices, he deemed no employment more honourable than to labour for his own fubfiftence.

What would all your late friends have faid, to see the greatest men in England, and the bravest officers of the army, crowding round the house of one of those obscure farmers you have been accustomed to defpife, and intreating him, in the most respectful language, to leave his fields, and accept of the highest dignity in the govern-ment or army? Yet this was actually the state of things at Rome, and it was characters like these, with all the train of severe and rugged virtues, that elevated that people above all the other nations of the world .- And tell me, my little friend, fince chance, not merit, too frequently allots the fituation in which men are to act, had you rather, in an high station, appear to all mankind unworthy of the advantages you enjoy, or, in a low one, feem equal to the most exalted employments by your virtues and abilities?

Such were the conversations which Mr. Barlow frequently held with Tommy, and which which never failed to inspire him with new resolution to persevere. Nor could he help being frequently affected by the comparison of Harry's behaviour with his own. No cloud seemed ever to shade the features of his friend, or alter the uniform sweetness of his temper. Even the repeated provocations he had received were either totally obliterated, or had made no disagreeable impressions. After discharging the necessary duties of the day, he gave up the rest of his time to the amusement of Tommy, with so much zeal and affection, that he could not avoid loving him a thousand times better than before.

During the evening he frequently converfed with the honest negro concerning the most remarkable circumstances of the country where he was born. One night that he seemed peculiarly inquisitive, the black gave him the following account of himself.

I was born, faid he, in the neighbourhood of the river Gambia in Africa. In this country people are aftonished at my colour, and start at the fight of a black man, as if he did not belong to their species: but there, every body resembles me, and when the first white men landed upon our coast, we were as much surprized with their appearances ances as you can be with ours. In some parts of the world I have seen men of a yellow hue, in others of a copper colour, and all have the foolish vanity to despise their fel-low-creatures as infinitely inferior to them-felves. There indeed they entertain these conceits from ignorance; but in this country, where the natives pretend to superior reason, I have often wondered they could be influenced by fuch a prejudice. Is a black horse thought to be inferior to a white one, in speed, or strength, or courage? Is a white cow thought to give more milk, or a white dog to have an acuter fcent in purfuing the game? On the contrary, I have generally found, in almost every country, that a pale colour in animals is considered as a mark of weakness and inferiority. Why then should a certain race of men imagine themselves superior to the rest, for the very circumstance they despise in other animals?

But in the country where I was born, it is not only man that differs from what we fee here, but every other circumstance. Here, for a considerable part of the year, you are chilled by frosts and snows, and scarcely behold the presence of the sun during that gloomy season that is called the winter.

With

With us the fun is always present, pouring out light and heat, and scorching us with his siercest beams. In my country we know no difference in the length of nights and days: all are of equal length throughout the year, and present not that continual variety which you see here. We have neither ice, nor frost, nor snow; the trees never lose their leaves, and we have fruits in every season of the year. During several months, indeed, we are scorched by unremitting hears, which parch the ground, dry up the rivers, and afflict both men and animals with intolerable thirst. In that season, you may behold lions, tygers, elephants, and a variety of other ferocious animals, driven from their dark abodes in the midft of impene-trable forests, down to the lower grounds and the side of rivers. Eyery night we hear their savage yells, their cries of rage, and think ourselves scarcely safe in our cottages. In this country you have reduced all other animals to subjection, and have nothing to fear except from each other. You even shelter yourselves from the injuries of the weather in mansions that seem calculated to last for ever, in impenetrable houses of brick or stone, that would have scarcely any thing to fear from the whole animal creation:

creation; but, with us, a few reeds twifted together, and perhaps daubed over with slime or mud, compose the whole of our dwellings. Yet there the innocent negro would fleep as happy and contented as you do in your palaces, provided you did not drag him by fraud and violence away, and force him to endure all the excesses of your

It was in one of these cottages that I first remember any thing of myself. A few stakes set in the ground, and interwoven with dry reeds, covered at top with the spreading leaves of the palm, composed our dwelling. Our furniture consisted of three or sour earthen pipkins, in which our sood was dressed; a few mats woven with a silky kind of grass to serve as beds; the instruments with which my mother turned the ground, and the javelin, arrows, and lines, which my father used in sishing or the chace. In this country, and many others where I have been, I observe that nobody thinks himself happy till he has got together a thousand things which he does not want, and can never use; you live in houses so big, that they are fit to contain an army; you cover yourselves with superstands clothes, you cover yourselves with superfluous clothes, that restrain all the motions of your bodies: when when you want to eat, you must have meat enough served up to nourist a whole village; yet I have seen poor famished wretches starving at your gate, while the master had before him at least an hundred times as much as he could confume. We negroes, whom you treat as favages, have different manners and different opinions. The first thing that I can remember of myself was the running naked about such a cottage as I have described, with sour of my little brothers and sisters. I have observed your children here with assonishment: as soon as they are born, it feems to be the business of all about them, to render them weak, helpless, and unable to use any of their limbs. The little negro, on the contrary, is fcarcely horn before he learns to crawl about upon the ground. Unrestrained by bandages or ligatures, he comes as soon and as easily to the persect use of all his organs as any of the beatts which surround him. Before your children here are taught to venture them-felves upon their feet, he has the perfect use of his, and can follow his mother in her daily labours.

This I remember was my own case. Sometimes I used to go with my mother to the field, where all the women of the village were affembled to plant rice for their subfiftence. The joyful fongs which they used to sing, amid their toils, delighted my infant ear; and when their daily task was done, they danced together under the shade of spreading palms. In this manner did they raife he simple food, which was sufficient for themselves and their children, yams, a root resembling your potatoe, Indian corn, and, above all, rice; to this were added the fruits which nature spontaneously produced in our woods, and the produce of the chace and fishing. Yet with this we are as much contented as you are with all your splendid tables, and enjoy a greater share of health and strength. As soon as the fiery heat of the fun declined, you might behold the master of every cottage reposing before his own door, and feating upon his mess of roots or fruits, with all his family around. If a traveller or stranger happened to come from a distant country, he was welcome to enter into every house and share the provifions of the family. No door was barred against his entrance, no furly servant infulted him for his poverty; he entered wherever he pleafed, fat himself down with the family, and then pursued his journey, or reposed himself in quiet till the next morning.

morning. In each of our towns there is generally a large building, where the elder part of the fociety are accustomed to meet in the shade of the evening, and converse upon a variety of subjects; the young and vigorous divert themselves with dances and other pastimes, and the children of different ages amuse themselves with a thousand sports and gambols adapted to their age: some aim their little arrows at marks, or dart their light and blunted javelins at each other, to form themselves for the exercises of war and the chace; others wrestle naked upon the sand, or run in sportive races, with a degree of activity which I have never seen among the Europeans, who pretend to be our masters.

I have described to you the building of our houses; simple as they are, they answer every purpose of human life, and every man is his own architect. An hundred or two of these edifices compose our towns, which are generally surrounded by losty hedges of thorns to secure us from the midnight attacks of wild beasts, with only a single entrance, which is carefully closed at night.

You talk, faid Tommy, of wild beafts; pray have you many of them in your country? Yes, faid the black, master, we have them of many forts, equally dreadful and ferocious. First, we have the lion, which I dare fay you have heard of, and perhaps feen. He is bigger than the largest mastiff, and infinitely stronger and more fierce; his paws alone are fuch, that with a fingle blow, he is able to knock down a man, and almost every other animal; but these paws are armed with claws so sharp and dreadful, that nothing can relift their violence. When he roars, every beaft of the forest betakes himself to slight, and even the boldest hunter can scarcely hear it without difmay. Sometimes, the most valiant of our youth assemble in bands, arm themfelves with arrows and javelins, and go to the chace of these destructive animals. When they have found his retreat, they generally make a circle round, uttering shoutst and cries, and clashing their arms, to rouze him to resistance. The lion, mean-while, looks round upon his affailants with indifference or contempt; neither their number, nor their horrid shouts, nor the glitter of their radiant arms, can daunt him for an instant. At length he begins to lash his fides with his long and nervous tail, a certain fign of rifing rage, his eyes sparkle Vor. III. with with destructive fires and, if the number of the hunters is very great, he perhaps moves flowly on. But this he is not permitted to do; a javelin, thrown at him from behind, wounds him in the flank, and compels him to turn. Then you behold him rouzed to fury and desperation; neither wounds, nor streaming blood, nor a triple row of barbed spears, can prevent him from springing upon the daring black who has wounded him. Should he reach him, in the attack, it is certain death; but generally the hunter, who is at once con-tending for glory and his own life, and is inured to danger, avoids him by a nimble leap, and all his companions haften to his affiftance. Thus is the lion pressed and wounded on every side, his rage is inessectual, and only exhausts his strength the faster; an hundred wounds are pouring out his blood at once, and at length he bites the ground in the agonies of death, and yields the victory though unconquered.

When he is dead, he is carried back in triumph by the hunters, as a trophy of their courage. All the village rushes out at once; the young, the old, women and children, uttering joyful shouts, and praising the valour of their champions. The elders admire his prodigious fize, his mighty limbs, his dreadful fangs, and perhaps repeat tales of their own exploits; the women feem to tremble at their fierce enemy even in his death; while the men compel their children to approach the monster, and tinge their little weapons in his blood. All utter joyful exclamations, and feasts are made in every house, to which the victors are invited as the principal guests. These are invited as the principal guests. These are invented at once to reward those who have performed so gallant an achievement, and to encourage a spirit of enterprize in the rest of the nation.

What a dreadful kind of hunting must this be, said Tommy. But I suppose if any one meets a lion alone, it is impossible to resist him. Not always, answered the black. I will tell you what I once was witness to myself. My father was reckoned not only the most skilful hunter, but one of the bravest of our tribe: innumerable are the wild beasts which have fallen beneath his arm. One evening, when the inhabitants of the whole village were assembled at their sports and dances, a monstrous lion, allured, I suppose, by the smell of human sless, burst unexpectedly upon them, without warning them of his approach, by roaring as he commonly does. As they were unarmed, and unprepared for defence, all but my father inflantly fled, trembling, to their huts; but he, who had never yet turned his back upon any beaft of the forest, drew from his side a kind of knife, or dagger, which he constantly wore, and, placing one knee and one hand upon the ground, waited the approach of his terrible foe. The lion instantly rushed upon him with a fury not to be defcribed; but my father received him upon the point of his weapon, with fo fteady and fo composed an aim, that he buried it several inches in his belly. The beast attacked him a second time, and a fecond time received a dreadful wound, not however without laying bare one of my father's fides with a fudden stroke of his claws. The rest of the village then rushed in, and soon dispatched the lion with innumerable wounds.

This exploit appeared so extraordinary, that it spread my father's same throughout the whole country, and gained him the name of the undaunted hunter, as an honourable distinction, from the neighbourhood.—Under such a parent, it was not long before I was taught every species of the chace. At first, my father only suffered fered me to pursue stags and other feeble animals, or took me in his canoe to fish. Soon, however, I was entrusted with a bow and arrows, and placed with many other children and young men to defend our ricefields from the depredations of the riverhorse. Rice, it is necessary to observe, is a plant that requires great moisture in the foil; all our plantations, therefore, are made by the fide of rivers, in the foft fertile foil which is overflowed in the rainy feafon. But, when the grain is almost ripe, we are forced to defend it from a variety of hurtful animals, that would otherwise deprive us of the fruits of our labours: among these, one of the principal is the animal I have mentioned. His fize and bulk are immense, being twice the bigness of the largest ox: which I have feen in this country. He has four legs, which are short and thick, an head of a monstrous magnitude, and jaws that are armed with teeth of a prodigious fize and strength; besides two prominent tusks, which threaten destruction to all affailants.

But this animal, though so large and strong, is chiefly an inhabitant of the river, where he lives upon sish and water-roots.

It

It is fometimes a curious but a dreadful fight, when a boat is gliding over a fmooth part of the stream, of unusual depth and clearness, to look down and behold this monstrous creature travelling along the bottom feveral yards below the furface. Whenever this happens, the boatman instantly paddles another way; for such is the strength of the creature, that he is able to overfet a bark of moderate fize, by rifing under it, or to tear out a plank with his fangs, and expose those who are in it to the dangers of an unexpected shipwreck. All the day he chiefly hides himself in the water, and preys upon fish; but, during the gloom of night, he issues from the river, and invades the fields of standing corn, which he would foon lay defolate, were he not driven back by the shouts and cries of those who are stationed to defend them. At this work had I affifted feveral fuccessive nights, till we were almost wearied with watching. At length, one of the most enterprizing of our young men proposed, that we should no longer content ourselves with driving back the enemy, but boldly attack him, and punish him for his temerity. With this purpose, we concealed ourselves in a convepient spot, till we had seen one of the riverhorfes horses issue from the water, and advance a confiderable way into our plantations: then we rushed from our hiding-place with furious shouts and cries, and endeavoured to intercept his return: but the beaft, confiding in his superior strength, advanced flowly on, fnarling horribly, and gnashing his dreadful tusks; and in this manner he opened his way through the thickest of our battalions. In vain we poured upon him on every fide our darts and arrows, and every missive weapon; so well defended was he in an impenetrable hide, that every weapon either rebounded as from a wall, or glanced aside without in the least annoying. At length, one of the boldest of our youth advanced unguardedly upon him, and en-deavoured to wound him from a shorter distance; but the furious beast, rushing upon him with an unexpected degree of fwiftness, ripped up his body with a single stroke of his enormous tusks, and then, feizing him in his furious jaws, lifted up his mangled body as if in triumph, and crushed him into a bleeding and promiscuous mass. Fear instantly seized upon our company; all involuntarily retreated, and seemed inclined to quit the unequal combat; all but myfelf, who, enflamed with grief and rage, L 4 for

for the loss of my companion, determined either to revenge his death, or perish in the attempt. Seeing, therefore, that it was in vain to attack him in the usual manner, I chose the sharpest arrow, and fitted it to the bow-string; then, with a cool, unterrified aim, observing the animal that moved nimbly on to the river, I discharged it full at his broad and glaring eye-ball with fuch success, that the barbed point penetrated even to his brain, and the monfter fell expiring to the ground.

This action, magnified beyond its deserts, gained me universal applause throughout the hamlet: I was from that time looked upon as one of the most valiant and fortunate of our youth. The immense body of the monster which I had slain was cut to pieces, and borne in triumph to the village. All the young women received me with fongs of joy and congratulation; the young men adopted me as their leader in every hazardous expedition, and the elders applauded me with fuch expressions of esteem as filled my ignorant heart with vanity and exultation.

But what was more agreeable to me than all the rest, my father received me with transport, and, pressing me to his bo-fom with tears of joy, told me, that now he could die with pleasure, since I had exceeded his most sanguine expectations. I, said he, have not lived inactive, or inglorious; I have transfixed the tiger with my shafts; I have, though alone, attacked the lion in his rage, the terror of the woods, the fiercest of animals; even the elephant has been compelled to turn his back and fly before my javelin: but never, in the pride of my youth and strength, did I achieve fuch an exploit as this. He then went into his cabin and brought forth the bow and fatal arrows which he was accustomed to use in the chace. Take them, take them, faid he, my fon, and refcue my weaker arm from a burthen which it is no longer destined to sustain. Age is now creeping on; my blood begins to cool, my finews flacken, and I am no longer equal to the task of supporting the glories of our race. That care shall now be thine, and with a firmer hand shalt thou henceforth use these weapons against the beasts of the forest and the enemies of our country.

Such was the account which the negro gave to Tommy, in different conversations, L5 of his birth and education. His curiofity was gratified with the recital, and his heart expanded in the fame proportion that his knowledge improved. He reflected, with shame and contempt, upon the ridiculous prejudices he had once entertained; he learned to confider all men as his brethren and equals; and the foolish distinctions which pride had formerly suggested were gradually obliterated from his mind. Such a change in his sentiments rendered him more mild, more obliging, more engaging than ever; he became the delight of all the samily; and Harry, although he had al ways loved him, now knew no limits to his affection.

One day he was surprized by an unexpected visit from his father, who met him with open arms, and told him, that he was now come to take him back to his own house. I have heard, said he, such an account of your present behaviour, that the past is intirely forgotten, and I begin to glory in owning you for a son. He then embraced him with the transports of an affectionate father who indulges the strongest sentiments of his heart, but sentiments he had long been forced to restrain. Tommy returned his careffes with genuine warmth, but with a degree of respect and humility he had once been little accustomed to use. I will accompany you home, fir, faid he, with the greatest readiness; for I wish to see my mother, and hope to give her fome fatisfaction of my future behaviour. You have both had too much to complain of in the past; and I am unworthy of such affectionate parents. He then turned his face aside, and shed a tear of real virtue and gratitude, which he instantly wiped away as unworthy the composure and fortitude of his new character...

But, fir, added he, I hope you will not object to my detaining you a little longer, while I return my acknowledgments to all the family, and take my leave of Harry. Surely, faid Mr. Merton, you can entertain no doubt upon that subject: and, to give you every opportunity of discharging all your duties to a family, to which you owe fo much, I intend to take a dinner with Mr. Sandford, whom I now see coming home, and then returning with you in the evening.

At this instant farmer Sandford approached, and very respectfully saluting Mr. Merton, invited him to walk in. But Mr, Mr. Merton, after returning his civility, drew him afide as if the had fome private business to communicate. When they were alone, he made him every acknowledged ment that gratitude could suggest; but words, added Mr. Merton, are very insufficient to return the favours I have received; for it is to your excellent family, together with the virtuous Mr. Barlow, that I owe the preservation of my son. Let me, therefore, intreat you to accept of what this pocket book contains, as a slight proof of my sentiments, and lay it out in whatever manner you please, for the advantage of your family.

Mr. Sandford, who was a man both of fense and humour, took the book, and, examining the inside, found that it contained bank-notes to the amount of some hundred pounds. He then carefully shut it up again, and, returning it to Mr. Merton, told him that he was infinitely obliged to him for the generosity which prompted him to such a princely act; but, as to the present itself, he must not be offended if he declined it. Mr. Merton, still more astonished at such disinterestedness, pressed him with every argument he could think of; he desired him to consider the state of his family; family; his daughters unprovided for; his fon himself, with dispositions that might adorn a throne, brought up to labour; and his own advancing age, which demanded ease and respite, and an increase of the conveniencies of life.

And what, replied the honest farmer, is it, but these conveniencies of life, that are the ruin of all the nation? When I was a young man, Master Merton, and that is near forty years ago, people in my condition thought of nothing but doing their duty to God and man, and labouring hard: this brought down a bleffing upon their heads, and made them thrive in all their worldly concerns. When I was a boy, farmers did not lie droning in bed as they do now till fix or feven; my father, I be-lieve, was as a good a judge of business as any in the neighbourhood, and turned as ftraight a furrow as any ploughman in the county of Devon; that filver cup, which I intend to have the honour of drinking your health out of to-day at dinner, that very cup was won by him at the great ploughingmatch near Axminster .- Well, my father used to say, that a farmer was not worth a farthing that was not in the field by four; and my poor dear mother too, the besttemtempered woman in the world, she always began milking exactly at five; and if a fingle foul was to be found in bed after four in fummer, you might have heard her from one end of the farm to the other .- I would not disparage any body, or any thing, my good fir, but those were times indeed; the women, then, knew fomething about the management of an house: it really was quite a pleasure to hear my poor mother lecture the fervants; and the men were men, indeed; pray, did you ever hear the story of my father's being at Truro, and throwing the famous Cornish wrestler, squinting Dick the miner?

Mr. Merton began to be convinced, that, whatever other qualities good Mr. Sand-ford might have, he did not excel in brevity; and therefore endeavoured in still stronger terms to overcome the delicacy of the farmer, and prevail upon him to accept his present.

But the good farmer pursued his point thus; Thank you, thank you, my dear fir, a thousand times, for your good will; but, as to the money, I must beg your pardon if I perfift in refuling it. Formerly, fir, as I was faying, we were all happy and healthy, and our affairs prospered, because we : we never thought about the conveniencies of life: now, I hear of nothing elfe. One neighbour, for I will not mention names, brings his for up to go a shooting with gentlemen; another fends his to market upon a blood horse, with a plated bridle; and then the girls, the girls !-There is fine work, indeed; they must have their hats and feathers, and riding-habits; their heads as big as bushels, and even their hind-quarters stuck out with cork or pasteboard; but scarcely one of them can milk a cow, or churn, or bake, or do any one thing that is necessary in a family; so that unless the government will fend them all to this new fettlement, which I have heard fo much of, and bring us a cargo of plain, honest housewives, who have never been at boarding-schools, I cannot conceive how we farmers are to get wives.

Mr. Merton laughed very heartily at this fally, and told him, that he would venture to affert it was not so at his house.—Not quite so bad, indeed, said the farmer; my wife was bred up under a notable mother, and, though she must have her tea every afternoon, is, in the main, a very good sort of woman. She has brought her daughters up a little better than usual; but I can af-

fure you she and I have had many a good argument upon the subject. Not but she approves their milking, spinning, and making themselves useful; but she would fain have them genteel, Master Merton: all women now are mad after gentility; and, when once gentility begins, there is an end of industry. Now, were they to hear of fuch a tum as you have generously offered, there would be no peace in the house. My wenches, instead of Deb and Kate, would be Miss Deborah and Miss Catharine; in a little time, they must be fent to boardingschool, to learn French and music, and wriggling about the room. And, when they come back, who must boil the pot, or make the pudding, or sweep the house, or ferve the pigs?-Did you ever hear of Miss Juliana, or Miss Harriet, or Miss Carolina, doing fuch vulgar things?

Mr. Merton was very much struck with the honest farmer's method of expressing himself, and could not help internally allowing the truth of his representations; yet he still pressed him to accept his present, and reminded him of the improvement of his farm.

Thank you again, and again, replied the farmer; but the whole generation of the Sandfords Sandfords have been brought up to labour with their own hands for these hundred years; and, during all that time, there has not been a dishonest person, a gentleman, or a madman amongst us. And shall I be the first to break the customs of the family, and perhaps bring down a curfe on all our heads?-What could I have more, if I were a lord, or a macaroni, as I think you call them?—I have plenty of victuals and work, good firing, cloaths, a warm house, a little for the poor, and, between you and I, fomething, perhaps, in a corner to fet my children off with, if they behave well.-Ah! neighbour, neighbour, if you did but know the pleasure of holding plough after a good team of horses, and then going tired to bed, perhaps you'd wish to have been brought up a farmer too.—But in one word, as well as a thousand, I shall never forget the extraordinary kindness of your offer; but, if you would not ruin a whole family of innocent people that love you, even confent to leave us as we are.

Mr. Merton then feeing the fixed determination of the farmer, and feeling the justice of his coarse but strong morality, was obliged; however reluctantly, to deand at here tift.

sist; and Mrs. Sandford coming to invite them to dinner, he entered the house, and paid his respects to the family.

After the cloth was removed, and Mr. Sandford had twice or thrice replenished his filver mug, the only piece of finery in his house, little Harry came running in, with so much alacrity and heedlessness, that he tore Miss Deborah's best apron, and had nearly precipitated Miss Catharine's new cap into the fire, for which the young ladies and his mother rebuked him with fome acrimony. But Harry, after begging pardon with his usual good humour, cried, Father, father, here is the prettiest team of horses, all matched, and of a colour, with new harness, the most complete I ever saw in my life; and they have stopped at our back-door, and the man fays they are brought for you. Farmer Sandford was just then in the middle of his history of the ploughing-match at Axminster; but the relation of his son had such an involuntary effect upon him, that he started up, overfet the liquor and the table, and, making an hasty apology to Mr. Merton, ran out to see these wonderful horses.

Presently he returned, in equal admiration with his son. Master Merton, said he,

I did not think you had been so good a judge of an horse. I suppose they are a new purchase, which you want to have my opinion upon; and, I can assure you, they are the true Suffolk sorrels, the first breed of working horses in the kingdom; and these are some of the best of their kind. Such as they are, answered Mr. Merton, they are yours; and I cannot think, after the obligations I am under to your family, that you will do me so great a displeasure as to refuse. Mr. Sandford stood for some time in mute aftonishment; but, at length, he was beginning the civilest speech he could think of to refuse so great a present, when Tommy coming up, took him by the hand, and begged him not to deny to his father and himself the first favour they had ever asked. Besides, said he, this present is less to yourself than to little Harry; and, furely, after having lived fo long in your family, you will not turn me out with diffrace, as if I had mifbehaved.

—Here Harry himself interposed, and, considering less the value of the present than the feelings and intentions of the giver, he took his father by the hand, and bebought him to oblige master Merton and his his father. Were it any one elfe, I would not fay a word, added he; but I know the generofity of Mr. Merton, and the goodness of master Tommy so well, that they will receive more pleasure from giving, than you from taking the horses. Though I must confess, they are such as would do credit to any body; and they beat farmer Knowles's all to nothing, which have long been reckoned the best team in all the country.

This last reflection, joined with all that had preceded, overcame the delicacy of Mr. Sandford; and he at length consented to order the horses to be led into his stables. And now Mr. Merton, having made the most affectionate acknowledgements to all this worthy and happy family, among whom he did not forget the honest black, whom he promifed to provide for, fummoned his fon to accompany him home. Tommy arose, and, with the sincerest gratitude, bade adieu to Harry and all the rest, shall not be long without you, said he to Harry; to your example I owe most of the little good that I can boast; you have taught me how much better it is to be useful than rich or fine; how much more amiable able to be good than to be great.—Should I be ever tempted to relapfe, even for an inftant, into any of my former habits, I will return hither for inftruction; and I hope you will again receive me. Saying this, he shook his friend Harry affectionately by the hand, and, with watery eyes, accompanied his father home.
